When he had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, he died: some say in his bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyranny, he gaue order to haue him slaine, or sold for a slaue. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stilled his crueltie, The hate of euill men; and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his iniustice. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poyson all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest men doe: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and, as our Sauour Christ hath told vs, The world will loue her owne.

To this Dionysius his sonne of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his King-dome and his Vices. To win the loue of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that he had fastned vnto himselfe the peoples affections; hee cast off the Sheepes skin, and put on that of the Woollfe. For being iealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to be slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wiues; Doris of Locris, and Aristomache a Syracusan, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosine, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the younger, called Arete, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a iust, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly giuen ouer to sensuality, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicill, to instruct the young King. And hauing perswaded the King to entertaine him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyrannic, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principallitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philitus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions seueritie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour, and caused him soone after to bee banished out of Sicill, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betweene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found found meanes, by sinister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his minde; and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilst Dion, in the meane time hauing furnished fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings seruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracusians their former libertie, or to make himselfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which hee made, to serue the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had serued the King for none other end, than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already become raised and enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made; if the King had had the grace to conceiue it aright. But the couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to stile his Loue and Liberalitie, Pride and Presumption; and heartened the young King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoyle they themselves shared no small portion. I haue heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the brabest men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But hee had neuer good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the West Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to raise himselfe aboue him; and to haue it said, That what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected; and was therefore more worthie of the Empire, than hee himselfe.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him the renewes of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moueables, at his owne pleasure: not without giuing hope, to recall him in short time. Had hee continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue bene well pleased to liue well, as he did at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby vrged him to take another court, than to seeke the restitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men (with whose helpe hee might retorne into Sicill. Yet he got not about eight hundred (for hee carried the matter close) to follow him in this aduenture. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did hee doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should bee needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicill, marched to Syracuse, entered the Citie without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, saue the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie, but hee quickly had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recouer the Towne, hee was faine to depart; leaving yet the Castle to the custodie of Apollocrates his eldest sonne. Yet ere hee went, his Minion Philitus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recouerie of his Countrie libertie, had the same reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Estates. Hee was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himselfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great ioy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troupes enter the Castle: they sallie out, assaile, spoyle, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arriue, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townes men, thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castle sallie againe, with greater furie than euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour; the loue of his Countrie firmmounting all the iniuries that hee had receiued. Hee sets vpon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Armie; and quenches the fire euery where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after hee had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had wel-neere burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Castle, with the annihilation and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates after after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom hee had best deserved, and whom hee had loued most, gave an untimely end to his dayes. For hee was soon after this his victorie, murdered by Gylippus; who, after hee had, with ill success, awhile gouerned Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italy, recouers his estate, and returnes to Syracuse, driuing Nysus thence, whom he found Gouerneur therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more than euer, his cruelty, flee to Ictes, a Syracusan borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Ictes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not onely to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being deservedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Ictes also sends thither, and dissuades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tells them, by his messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armie in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this reason of Ictes, more enraged than dissuaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Ictes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driuen Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Ictes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliuer his Countrey. Therefore, bearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium; whose Capitaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, than he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Capitaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vied to him in priuate; that hee might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victorie, obtained by a few faire words, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the preasse; and hauing set saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully receiued by Andromachus the Gouerneur. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where surprising Ictes his Armie, he slew a part therof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranitans ioyned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld vp himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Ictes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie dayes, after his arriual, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a priuate man, was still invaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Ictes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are staid in Italie by foule weather. Ictes is strengthened with three thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie, Ictes assaulteth the Castle. Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Ictes doe therefore resolute to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acra, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arriue: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Ictes, being being frighted out of Sicil (which he might easily haue conquered): with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and bears downe the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feed on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, hee writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Island.

But a new storme ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arriue about Lilybæum, with three score and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and challengeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a Riuer.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boisterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken: ten thousand slaine, six thousand taken, with all their carriages and provisions: among which there were found a thousand Arctagile and grauen. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Ictes, and following his victorie, tooke him, with his son Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imposed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Ictes his wiues & daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of Godippon Ictes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife and a young child of his, with Ariflamache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Hippus Tyrant of Messina: but Timoleon, pursuing him, won the towne; deliuering Hippus to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Agathocles and all other, the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should not passe the Riuer of Lycus. After this, hee liued in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funerals, being for euer ordained, to be kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Island; the Inhabitants, choiced their libertie in peace, about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enioyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

Twentie yeeres after the death of Timoleon, there started vp one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prætor, finally, became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes hee ran, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalltie. For hee had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna; and the Campanes, he did them memorable seruice: and on the contrary, as memorable seruice for the Murgantines, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so streightly, that the Citizens were driven to craue aide, even from their ancient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracusians. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that hee got him to make peace betwene himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and sequant to the State of Carthage, for euer after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betwene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; he entertaines six thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie also being diuided into many factions) hee assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposers; divides the spoile of the rich, among the poore, and giues liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to rauish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controulement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carcases, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls, their furie had no further subiect to worke on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent sicknesse, by which the common-wealth was vterly consumed, hee found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had administred; and that hee affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratic, by which it had bene gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For as hee knew, that he had left nohe living, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had been partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabbie, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, saluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had bene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his patterne; but the one was of base, the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke liberty from a common-wealth the other fought onely to succeed in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the other, after hee had obtained the Crowne, sought, by making good lawes, to recover the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Justin; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the summe whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waste the whole Island; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that hee should reduce all Sicill into such termes as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than mere falsehood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redresse. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his couenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africk, and a new Capitaine appointed to succeed in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agathocles to reason, if otherwise hee would not hearken to it. All this ended, to saue their Confederates, from suffering such iniuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it seuerely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutinie: the suffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and so referred vntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had soone notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that hee had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrey. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusan, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to strengthen himselfe, both in power and authority, euen against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custome of those, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices, thinking to deale subtilly and finely, they spin their threads so small, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deale substantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices: which if hee could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into so much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore hee followed the example, which some of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for feare of such a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what sort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar serued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. Hee saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of them in action. Hee dissembled no longer; but, instead of spoyle and robbery, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. Hee had made the better part of Sicill his owne; the Carthaginians,

Carthaginian forces arrived: which thinking to haue incouraged an ill-established Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them sharpe chiestaine-ment. They were beaten by him, and their Naue was so Tempest-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their businesse vndone, and returne into Africke.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned & furnished, was broken by foule weather, and the best part of it cast away, euen whilst it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the sonne of Gisco, gathering together the remainders of his ship-wracke, was bold to passe ouer into Sicill, and landed not far from Gela; where Agathocles was soone readie to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed betwene them, in which (commonly) the Syracusan had the better. But his good success begat presumption, whereby hee lost a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduerser chance is enough to overthrow the state of a Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumspection. The war was soone transferred to the walls of Syracuse, within which Agathocles was closed vp, and driven to make his last defence by their helpe, who may be iudged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great massacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the most part) such, as had bene either mercenary Souldiers, in franchised slaues, or base & needie people; helpers in establishing the present Government, and Executioners of the murders, and spoyle, committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well obserued, and (withall) so fearefull, that they durst not stirre. But it was enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their Citie. Famine was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessity, Agathocles aduanced vpon a strange course, which the euent commended as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Hauen, and committing the government of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had be thought himselfe of a meane, both to raise the siege, and to repaire all other losses. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the besieged from issuing forth.

Now at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with corne, and other provisions, were drawing neere vnto Syracuse. To intercept these, the Carthaginians hoise saile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles, issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheeled about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their coming, nor fled backe into the Citie, but made all speed towards Africke, and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would giue them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten to Syracuse, which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceiued, first, that by pursuing two fleets at once, he had misst of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere, hee thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not haue leisure to doe much mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Naue followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after sixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselves, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, & beat them; and, hauing sunke, or taken many, draue the rest to flie which way they could, laden with such strange tidings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his purpose, letting them vnderstand, That there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not onely from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicill, than by bringing the war to their owne doors. For here (said he) they haue many, that hate them, and that will readily take arms against them, as soone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foot, which dare to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified, their people vntaunted, and and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercenarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue: which wee may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with thau braue words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reseruing one or two to vse as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, save onely in victory. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terror to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicil. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage vnto the enemies; they raise a great Armie, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno and Bomilcar; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles: But it seldom happens, that dissension betwene Commanders produceth any so fortunate euent. Necessitie drave Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not surre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie winneth many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to bee lost, whilst he was trauiailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all his forces hee thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles backe into Sicil, than to be drawn home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a bad issue. Hee spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracusians: and hauing brought his matters to some good order, hee conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surpris. It was a prettie (though tragically) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that hee should sup the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and hee verily beleued it. Hee made more haste than good speed, toward the Citie: and comming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrappe him, whereinto hee fell. So hee was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that hee had no great cheere to his supper: for they stricke off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. Hee had allured Ophellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countrey into his hands: for that (as hee said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might reigne quietly. Ophellus came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his Warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and hee so preuailed in Africke, that hee got possession to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had embraced a desire of recovering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedom, after that they had so long bene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrey. These had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of

Sicil hee returned into Atrick, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a battaile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to helpe himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lacke of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoyle. It had now bene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) haue giuen to him, both money enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had bene distressed, not onely by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the losse of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange euents following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the said Iddol, in way of thankfulness for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnhappy men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings neere vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is vsuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vnto the Paulion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleeming, that the noise in the aduerser Campe, was a signe of the enemies comming to iaspit. But the Carthaginians had a safe retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeed the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) hee began to slay them, and was so stoutly resisted, that hee lost in this blinde fight, about foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the next hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weake feares, than lately he had known how to gouerne his ambition. Therefore hee tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely aboard his shippes, with his younger sonne (the elder hee suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flie into Sicil, thinking it the best course to take for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder son, Archagathus, perceiving his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by means of a sudden tumult, hee was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leauing both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noysed through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of rage caused not onely the common Souldier, but euen such as had bene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base; I need not vse words to proue: That his feare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriuing him of the succours which reason offered, the sequels doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace with Carthage vpon equal termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discountured his bloudy nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vnged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoyles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuised new engines of torment; wherein struing to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, hee made a frame of brass, that should serue to scorch mens bodies, and withall giue him leue to behold them in their miserie. So deuellish is the nature of man, when reason should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that hee neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserve his crowne: it threw him into new dangers. They whom hee had chased out of their Countrey, took armes against him, and drave him into such feare, that he was faine to seek the lone of Carthage, which by ruling well hee might haue had in Sicil. Hee shortly deliuered livered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phoenicians in Sicil, belonging unto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebels, and settled his estate. Having no further businesse left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italie. There hee subdued the Brutians; rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yeelded at his first coming. This done, he went to the Isle of Elpara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when hee had gotten this great summe, hee would needs exact a greater, and finding plainly that they had no more left, hee was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinkes) hee did well enough. For how could hee beleue those to be gods, that had continually giuen deafe eares to his horrible periuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rotted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Therigenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a yonger sonne of his owne, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grand-fathers Kingdome, without asking any leaue. These tydings wounded the heart of Agathocles with feare and sorrow. Hee saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom onely hee now held deare, which were Therigenia and her children. Therefore he aduised her and them to flie before they were surpris'd: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoide, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether hee threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but hee ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as hee first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traiterously occupied Messina, and infested a great part of the Island. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophesying that it would become a goodly champion field; wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiouritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our storie will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuatiō of the Roman warre in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

When Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messina, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great Citie; Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselfe by what meanes hee could, when they were not in case to giue him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilst Rome and Carthage were fighting for the masterie. In this good mood, the new Roman Consuls, M. Valerius, and C. Otacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they use of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracusan held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the whole time of their abode in the Island; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to run into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straining themselves to giue him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good prooue of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles; and therefore knew, that it was able to beare a very strong siege. And heereupon it is like that they were the more slacke, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to try the vitermost hazard of war against the Carthaginians, who fought no other thing than to bring it into slavery; not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as hee might preserve his owne tyranny: the latter, as a iust and good Prince, had no greater desire than to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that he enioyed a long and happy reigne, lining deare to his owne Subjects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vn- able to compasse it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Sea-fights in generall.

Hieron, hauing sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victualls, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming vpon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troopes they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arriued, they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the seat of the war, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, hauing made peace with Hieron, returne into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus, and Quintus Mamilius, arrive. They goe on towards Agrigentum: and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of haruest being come, a part of the Roman Armie range the Countrie to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sallie furiously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great losse; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their conent. Yet the Assailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their conent. Yet the Citie, by reason of the fertilitie of the soyle, and the neighbourhood of Carthage, grew in a short space from small beginnings, to great glory and riches. The plentie and luxurie thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, That the Agrigentines built Palaces of such sumptuousitie, as if they meant to live for euer; and made such feasts as if they meant to die the next day. But their greatest pompe and magnificence, was in their goodly temples, and theatres, water-conduits, and fish-ponds: the ruines wherof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome it selfe could neuer boast of the like. In the Porch of the temple of Iupiter Olympius, (by which wee may iudge of the temple it selfe) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of diuers colours; a worke the most magnificent and rare, that euer hath beene seene: on the other side the warre of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that siege; with the personages of the Heroes that were doers in that warre; all of the like beautifull stone, and of equall stature to the bodies of those men in ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter workes of that kinde, are but petty things, and meeke trifles. It would require a volume to expresse the magnificence of the temples of Hercules, Asinulapins, Concord, Iunolucina, Chastitie, Trisipina, Cyter and Pollux, wherein the Master-pieces of those exquisite Painters, and Caruers, Thidias Xenis, Myron, and Polyclitus, were to be seene. But in proceesse of time it rane the sam: fortune that all other great Cities haue done, and was ruined by diuers calamities of warre: whereof this warre brought vnto it not the least.

Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deepe trench, betwene the walls of the Citie and their Campe : and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any suddenly, by a fallie, nor those of the Countie without, breake vpon them vnawares : which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whilest the Siracusan supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage : after they had bene in this fort pent vp fve moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno; who arriues with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbefus, a Citie wherein the Romans had bestowed all their prouision. By meanes herof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no lesse straightly assieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romanes : insonmuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had bene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclea, hee makes approach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolute to sustaine him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directes the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, hee commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Armie, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romanes pursued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing slaughtered many, beates the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly encamped, waiting vntill some opportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight : But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day : and with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopelesse of succour, resolved to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; hee rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine : sure they were, that hee could not carry the Citie with him, which with litle a-doe the Romans entred, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposed rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this Warre, onely to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts : but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily, and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to saile ouer into Africa. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of priuate men, to couer the greatest things, but not to enioy the least; the desire of that which we neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what wee haue already. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World vnto this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Octacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land Towns gaue themselves vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets, as also to equall themselves in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of fve bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romanes a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fve on euery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke : and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-sands many many seats, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beate the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Masters : that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery yeare) was made Admirall : who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, than well aduised, past ouer to Messana with seuentene Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There he staid not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian was at the same time Gouvernour in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea-mans arriual, sent forth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consull; he grew no lesse foolish hardihead than Cornelius had bin. For hee, fancying to himselfe to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; fought them out with a fleet of fiftie saile : wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten; and leaunting the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest : for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romanes vnder Cornelius had lost but seuentene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fiftie.

The Romanes, being aduertised of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but glue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speed of them, deuised a certaine Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the weightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Mariners craft; the Vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open : so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush and cracke the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steady, and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may be giuen between one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a Long-ship.

Certainly, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must be skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in : he must belecue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betwene fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre : for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Strofie, lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, bene lost in the yeere 1588. if he had not bene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Annie aboard them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himself with those great and powerful Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it : which had he not done, he had not bene worthy to haue held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands than for the Presse,) I say, That a fleet of twentie shippes, all good failers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselves neere together, in a grosse squadron; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall backe vpon their owne next fellows : of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable or lost. Force them they Abraham; & cum quidem ipsi non esset Raych zled turobaie, proximo nomen est Charab. And this inscription (saith Barclay) was found in the Castle Raych, in the year 1531. Now whether these Inscriptions were truly as ancient, as these men beleeue they were, I leave every man to his owne faith. But that the City was of aged times, it appears by Thucydides, who affirmeth; when the Cecrops first sett into Sicily, that then the Phoenicians inhabited Panormus: which certaine it is they did in the first Punicke warre; so wrote the Carthaginians, who were Phoenicians, from whom the Romans (A. Aquilus, and C. Cornilius, commanding this Armie) took it. And when Marcellus besieged Syracuse, it sent him in ayde 2000. Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than subiect to the Romans; as well as unlik Perce, names it among the free Cities of Sicily. After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first Citie and Regall seate, as well of the Greeks and Saracens in that Iland, as of the Emperours of Constantinople; of the Normans, French, and Arragonians; which honour it holdeth to this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent wine which grows about it.

they may easily, because the twentie ships, which giue themselves scope, after they have giuen one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may giue them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall volicie; whereas those, that fight in a troope, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies use but one and the same beaten side. If the flecte of an hundred saile giue themselves any distance, then shall the lesser flecte preuaile, either against those that are a-reare and hind-most, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-sailing their fellowes keepe the winde;
And if vpon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall backe into their owne squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole flecte must suffer shipwracke, or render it selfe. That such aduantage may be taken vpon a flecte of vnequall speed, it hath bin well enough conceined in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians inuaded them, it may easily be observed.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subiect, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne; but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sunne, we shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and sorrowes; I will therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leues loquuntur, ingentes fugiunt.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their aduantage of swift boats, & boarding the Romans, haue lost fiftie saile of their Gallies; as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertie to saile about the West part of Sicily, where they raised the siege layed vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

Diuers enterseats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe.
The Romans prepare to inuade Africk: and obtaine a great victory at Sea.

THE victorie of Enilbus, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Nauall triumph, that was euer scene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great in-couragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicily, but all the other Iles betweene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soone after they sent a flect for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell was growne betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as cauled them to in-campe a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them vnawares, buried four thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately beene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new flect, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Seas from Sicily, arrived in the port where Hannibal with his new flect anchored. They set vpon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the flect which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping the danger. But it little auailed him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voyage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence: for (as it hath beene said of old) Non est bis in bello perire, In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, * till Pa-normus was besieged: where, when the Romans had fought in vaine to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they then departed from thence, and tooke certaine In-land Towns, as Myssistratum, Echna, Camerina, Hippama, and others, between Panormus and Messana.
The year following, C. Asilius the Consul, vvhho commanded the Roman flect, discouered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he vvas vvell beaten for the haste he made, & lost all, saue the Gallie which transported him: vvherein himselfe escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Asilius his flect was gotten vp: who renewing the fight, recouered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a

The Romans resolute to transport the vvarre into Africk, the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicily. The numbers, with vvhich each of them filled their flect, was perhaps the greatest that euer fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men, and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers in each Gallie, and three hundred rowers to euery Gallie, one with the other. The Roman flect was diuided into foure parts, of which the three first made the forme of a Wedge of Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flanks, and the third squadron, the Base:
the point thereof (vvherein vvere the two Consuls as Admiralls) looking toward the enemie, and the middle space lying empty. Their Vessells of carriage were towed by the third squadron. After all came vp the fourth, in forme of a Crescent; very well manned, but exceeding thinne: so that the hornes of it inclosed all the third squadron; together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian flect I cannot conceiue by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their flect was thinne, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en hay, a long front of horse, and thinne: which forme, since the Pistoll preuailed ouer the Lance, they haue changed. Behind this first outstretched front, their Battalions were more solide: for Amilcar, Admirall of the Carthaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies hauing the speed of the Romans) that, when the first flect of the Romans hastened to breake through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder themselves, & for eagernes of taking the Run-awayes, leaue their own three squadrons far behind them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third squadron towed their horse boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Reareward of all. According to Amilcars direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Carthaginian first flect, which ran away, they forthwith gaue after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the second squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neere vnto the body of the Carthaginian flect; led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) receiued a great losse, vntill their second squadron came vp, vvhich forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian flect, inuaded the Roman Reareward, and preuailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Asilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to sustain both squadrons. The Reare being relieved, the Consuls came to the aide of their third Battalioh, which towed the victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Africans; but the Consuls, ioyning their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part

This victorie fell vnto the Romans, partly by the hardinesse of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could neuer after ioyne himselfe vnto any of his other squadrons, that remained as yet in a faire likelihood of pre-uailling so long as they fought vpon equall tearmes, and but squadron to squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman flect vnengaged, and readie to giue succour to any of the other parts that were oppressed. So in conclusion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but foure and twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans lost thirtie that were swike, and threescore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his fleet into foure squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, whilest he himselfe fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies fleet had bene at the same time entertained, he had prevailed: But the second squadron, being fired, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed and Amilcar, being oppressed, and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieue both the third and the fourth squadron, and got the victorie.

For (saith he) the Lansjers, who are alwaies reserued intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turkes repose their greatest confidence; come vp in a grosse body, when all their troops on both sides are disbanded and in confusion; whereby they carrie the victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reseruation, did the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Friary in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and victorious aduantage it hath ever bene found, to keepe some one or two good troopes to looke on, when all else are disbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romanes preuail in Africk. Atilius the Consull proponndeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten, and made prisoner.

NOW the Romans according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-viualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arriued at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Heraclia in Sicill, where Amilcar himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leauing the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne about fiftie English mile from it. There they dis-embarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yielded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side, without which all inuasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arriued at their owne Carthage, fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither: but being aduertised that they had taken Clypea, they made prouisions of all forts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order giuen from the Senate, was, that one of the Consulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Consull is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thousand African Captaines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fiftene thousand foot, and fise hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places that were vnwalled, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the River of Bagrada, he encountered with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he slue, not without losse of many Souldiers, being driuen to vse against it such engines of warre, as serued properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Bastar, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicill fise thousand foote, and fise hundred horse to succour his Countrie. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were carefull to hold themselves free, from necessitie of comming to blowes: yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adis; they incampe, neere vnto him, and strongly (as they think) on the top of an hill: but thereby they lost the seruice, both of their Elephants, & of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs, Regulus discouered, & makes vse of it. He assailes them in their strength, whilest they defend in wilde, but in fine the Romans preuaile, & force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heels, they proceed to Tunis, a Citie within fiftie miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

By the losse of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Nomads, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult vpon their misfortunes; invade, and spoile their Territory; and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens; which findes his own aduantage; and assures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out, if he feared lest it might defend it selfe, vntill his time of Office, that was flecter expired, should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reape the fruit of obtaining it. Ambition therefore hath no respect but to it selfe, perfwaded him with fear of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vnworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so couragious and disdainfull, that they resolved, either to defend their liberty, or die the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arriued at the same time a great troope of Greekes, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine: Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, & of the overthrow which the Carthaginians recetied neere vnto Adis, gaue it out publicly, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ran, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; giues the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he put himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, consisted of no more than twentie thousand foot, and some thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had; Libertie; Lives; Goods; Wiues, and Children (which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea before spoken of, were misse-numbered: the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fifty thousand: were it not commonly found that they which vse the seruice of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their own doors).

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and placing his troops vpon safe and leuell ground, fittest both for his Elephants and horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it should soon be beaten. Their chief care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forelorne hope; that they might, either with darts and other casting weapons, drue backe the beasts vpon the Legions, or at least brake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to doe. By which means, as they were the less subiect vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed vnto the violence of horse, wherein the Enemy did faire exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a considerable distance: his horsemen, and some light-armed foote, of the Carthaginians and Velites, were in the wings. The first onser was giuen by the Elephants; against which the Romans were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following; and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battalions was helpfull. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through the first rankes, the squadrons neuertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, hauing in the first encounter, by reason of their aduantage in number, driuen those of Atilius out of the field, beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse; who being forced to some face every way, could neither passe forward nor yet retire; but had very much to doe, to keepe the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backes, fell upon the Carthaginians. Armin, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Company, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the oncoming upon equal terms. Here was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoiling to the body of their Armie, which being surrounded with the oncoming, and spent with trouble, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these trouppes, that open the way to a generall overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; destroying the whole Roman Armie, save two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Atilius the Consull. Of their own they lost no more, than eight hundred mercenaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans; that wheeling about to a quid the Elephants, bare down all before them, and made way euen to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby, fortune made the Romans know, that they were no lesse her passers, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent foue they had bin in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which she neuer gave nor sold to any mortall man. With what ioy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no lesse than this of Xerxes; all of them confirming that sentence of Euryptides, Mens una sapient, plurimum viciis manus, Many mans hands equal not one wise minde.

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xanthippus returned into Greece, whether for that he was more enuied than honoured, or for what other cause is unknowne.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ranfome of prisoners on both sides: giving his faith for returne if the businesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw, that his Country should lose by the bargain: so far was he from vrging the Senate unto compassion of his own miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to have the prisoners in Africke left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to have indured him an obstinate and malicious enemy; that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to preferue himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all vvarres (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small aduantage. Whatsoeuer the Carthaginians thought of him, sure it is, that his faithfull obseruance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appears, in all reason, to haue proceeded from a vainglorious fixity of minde, rather than from any necessity of State. For the exchange was made soone, after his death; vvherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by lo much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point, we are to consider that they liued vnder the Roman Empire. Atilius, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it other wise. Yet the Quarta which he suffered with extreame torments, could not be more grievous to him than it was dishonorable to Carthage. Neither do I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans deserved to be so better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelty doth not become more vvarrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead the Captaines of their enemies whom they took, yea although they were such as had otherwise made faire wars with them. Wherefore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall insolencie in others, as if it were a lawfull only to themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius in tolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, wherinto the Carthaginians were changed by more desperation; calls to remembrance, the like insolencie, and then prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath be denied. In such cases Inuen hold it impertinent, to adde vnto lonely more testimonies; approuing the true rules, from which our passions carry vs away. In the year 1378, the Carthaginians won so fast upon the Spaniards, as they not onely drad their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own fleet within two miles of Venice itselfe. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genowies (their State referred) whatsoeuer they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowe vpon with many former victories, would haue no composition; save the yeelding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assaile Doria with such desperate furie, that they brake his fleet, kill Doria himselfe, take nineteen of his Gallies, four score boards of Padua, and four thousand prisoners; recover Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, forcing the Genowies, basely to begge peace, to their extreame dishonour and disadvantage being beaten; which, being victorious, they might haue commanded to their greatest honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flinders, in the year 1581, when having taken a notable, and withall an ouer-craell reuenge vpon the Cannicks, who refused mercy to the rest, who in all humillie, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had rudely refused, and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out vpon his Citie with five thousand chosen men; and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, brake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished follow, and enforce him to hide himselfe vnder an heape of snow, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and saved himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

The affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against Atilius: How the Romans having lost their fleet by tempest, resolve to forsake the Sea: The great advantages of a good warre, betwene Nations divided by the Sea.

By the reputation of this late victorie, all places that had bin lost in Africke, returned to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea stands out, before which the Carthaginians sit down, and assaile it, but in vaine. For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Atilius with their forces in Africke, and withall, that Clypea was brought to be ready a grosse Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and sixtie Gallies, commanded by M. Aemilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consuls. At the Request of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans took by force an hundred and foure score of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their own men that had bin beleeged; and vnto done they made amaine toward Sicill, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despite the aduice of the Pilots, who pray them to tarry in the harbour in time, for that the season threatened some violent stormes, which they imagined between the rising of Orion, and of the Dog-starre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and caried them withall, that the South coast of Sicill had no good Ports, wherein to seek shelter, yet vpon such an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that they should conquer the Elements themselves. So, refusing to stay within some Port, as they were aduised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victorie against the Carthaginian fleet, to take a new worke in the conquest vpon the coast. The mercilesse winds in the meane while overtake them, and drive vnto Camerina, ouerturne and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but foure score of their fleet, which the Spaniards call the North windes, are very fierce, and therefore they that haue in those parts, call it the end of the winter. In passing the Seas toward Sicill, in the winter quarter, contrary to the windes, as the Carthaginians were, the Roman fleet was driven backe, with a hundred and fourety Gallies, which all in effect, was the same as if they had beene beaten, by the Carthaginians. From before the one and the other, was extreme dishonorable.

* There is no Part of the World, which hath not some certain times of outrageous weather be-lies their accidental stormes. We haue vpon our coast a Michaelmas flaw, that seldom or neuer fails: In the west Indies, in the moneths of August and September, whose most of three hundred and forty ships: so as their former great victory, was delivred by the Seas, before the fame there recovered Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaired all their warlike Vessels, hoping once again to command the Seas: they are also confident of their land-forces since the overthrow of Asilius. They send Asdrubal into Sicily with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arrives at Lilybaeum; where he begins to vex the Parsians of Rome. But ad- versitie doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three moneths (a matter of great more) one hundred and twenty ships; with which, and the remainder of their late ship- wracke, they row to Panormus, or Palermia, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicily, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison there, in, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Africa; to vvhich purpose they im- ploied C. Servilius, and C. Sempromius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Africa; but Fortune robbed them of all their get- tings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the Sands, and like to haue perished, nere vnto the lesser Syrtis, where they were faine to heave all over-board, that so they might get off: then, hauing with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybaeum, in their pa- sage from Panormus towards Italy, they lost an hundred and fifty of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the god of the waters favoured them no more, than the god of the waters assisted them. Of all that Mars enriched them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost besides vvhatch they lost in fight, foure hundred and fixe Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby receiued, perswaded them to giue ouer their Navi- gation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-armie into Sicily, vnder L. Cassius, and F. Furius, their Consuls. These they transported in some three score ordinary passage boats, by the streights of Messana, that are not aboue a mile and a halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the overthrow which Asilius receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before, so that for two yeares after, they kept the high & wooddie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champaign Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas did not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicily, without a Naue, much lesse to maintaine the war in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybaeum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicily, making sometimes a march of aboue an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the provisions that follow it, in lesse than foureteene daies, the Carthaginians would passe it vwith their Gallies, in eight and forty houres.

An old example we haue, of that great aduantage of transporting Armies by water, 40 between Cannus, and Edmond Ironside. For Cannus, vwhen he had entered the Thames with his Naue and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued, and sailing to the West, landed in Dorsetshire, so drawing Edmond & his Army thither. There finding all entertainment, he againe shipt his men, & entered the Southern, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcestershire; by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed back againe to London: by the means whereof he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, & succour could arrive. And this was not the least help, vvhich the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards. In the de- fence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Army from place to place, vvhich they wearied, and entire, with all the Munition & Artillerie belonging vwith, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue been able to doe. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Capitaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages haue brought forth, in the yeare 1590, carried his Armie by Sea, with forty Canons, to be- siege Boissedue, or Gersensden Berg; vvhich the enemies (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and vvhalls. But as soone as the winde sprung, he suddenly set saile, arriving in the mouth of the Meuse, turned vpon the Rhine, and thence to Uffel, and sat downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could could march ouer-land round about Holland, aboue fiftie score mile, and ouer many great Rivers with their Cannon and cartiage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spanish Armie had overtooke his wearisome march, and were now far from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile vpon the Rhine, changed his course in the night, and sailing down the streame, he was set downe before Halff, in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge vvhich was betwixt him. So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spanish Armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanish Armie was not sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, hauing fortified Halff, set saile againe, and precluded him selfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citie of notable importance; 50 and mastered it.

And to say the truth, it is impossible for any maritime Countrey, not hauing the coasts so well fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerful enemy, that is master of the Sea. Herein should rather, than Spain, than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second, had fully resolved to hinder Sir John Norris, in the yeare 1589, from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lisbon, and that he would haue kept off the English, by power of his land-forces, as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeare foregoing. Surely, it had not bin hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleven thousand. But where should his Armie haue bin bestowed? If about Lisborne, then would it haue beene easie 10 vnto the English, to take, ranlacke, and burne the Towne of Graine, and to waste the Countrey round about it. For the great and threaning preparations of the Earle of Arundell, the Marquise of Serubb, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the halfe leaue of eight thousand, vnder the Earle of Arundell, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris, and his As- sociates: considering, that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed 20 the further end, routed them, tooke their campe; tooke their Generals standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them ouer all the Countrey, which they fired. If a roy- al Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of priuate aduenturers, had thus begun the war in Galicia; I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portu- gale, and make haste to the defence of their S. Iago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir John Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie, into his Kingdom, whither com- ming strong, he expected to be readily and ioyfully welcomed: could they haue hindered his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Peniche, and march ouer the Countrey to Lisborne, fixe dayes journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) 30 passe along by the Riuer of Lysborne to Cascaiz, and there, hauing won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let vs consider of the matter it selfe, what another Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, whether an invading Armie may be resisted at their landing vpon the coast of Eng- land, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obseruations vpon Cassars Commentaries, that main- taines the affirmative. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping; and comparatiuely, as that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keep our enemy from treading vpon our grounds; wherein, if we faile, then must we seeke to make him wish, that he had staid at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particu- 40 lar circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question ge- neral, and positiue, whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemy from landing; I hold that it is vnable so to do: and therefore, I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduventure. For the encouragement of a just victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a most peri- cles consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monius, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, chiefly his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guinn, they of the Protestant Protestant religion, after the battaile of Monsieur, entered that Countie, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King saith he would haue giuen but reasonable meanes, je ne biengarde Monsieur l'Admiral, de faire boire les Chemins de la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Langry, on the contrary side, preferred the not fighting vpon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuerse consideration to be had, betwene such a Countie as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Ramparts are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuasions vpon firme land, that these great Capitaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countie, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countie: except euery Creeke, Port, or sandy Bay, had a powerfull Army, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelue thousand foot, and that those twelue thousand be layed in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and six thousand at Foulkston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (vnlesse some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemy, setting saile from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twenty and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkston be able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first arrivall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to run; or else giue them so much to doe, that they shall be glad to send for helpe to Foulkston, and perhaps to Margat: whereby those places will be left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelue thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to dis-imbarque his Armie, so that he shall find it vnlate, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleue, that he will play the best of his own game; and (having liberty to go which way he list) vnder covert of the night, set saile towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Yea the like may be said of Waymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily outrun the Souldiers that coast them. Les Armees ne valent point en poste; Armees neither stay, nor run post, saith a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of Ships may be seene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not be able to march it in sixe dayes. Again, when those troupes, lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length sit down in the mid-way, and leaue all at aduenture. But say it were otherwise; That the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receiue him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeare 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should haue landed in England.

The Isle of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being euery where hard of access, hauing no good harbour whereto shelter a Naue of friends; and vpon euery cove or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monsieur de Chastes, that held it to the stile of Don Antonio, with five or sixe thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquesse of Sant a Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquesse having shewed himselfe in the Road of Angra, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence, where he won a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chastes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strössi, slaine the yeare before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chastes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be persuaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and backe againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselves preuented by the more nimble ships of Spainie.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindered, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fajal, in the yeare 1597, is alleged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fajal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may by a ciuil interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraiid me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who aduised me not to vndertake it: and I harkened vnto them; somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilst they desired me, to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gave them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place, yea even there where I landed, if I would haue taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Ilanders should not think any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by 2. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Country Capitaines, and others, not of mine own Squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would haue bin short, when I had landed in some other place) that for want of their helpe I was driuen to turne taile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne Squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harvey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Stan, Sir Thom is Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Tennes, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Capitaine Lawrence Kemis, Capitaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselves and the enemy: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vndertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffs, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or sixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, vwhereon their Musketers lay on the Rest for vs, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euery in this example: but the reasons before alleadged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more priuate, than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of brauery, and take the shorter course, hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom bad I thought thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwife haue dealt with. But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; he that beheard this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop vs in place of his aduantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had won good footing) would needs follow vs to the Towne, were driven by him, to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselves to an hastie trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Maiesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdain, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beeste in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Maiesty, after God, will employ his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the mastery of the Seas. The victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consull as Panormus: The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybæum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grieuous losses receiued, vnder Claudius and Iunius their Consuls, abandon the Seas againe.

WHen, without a strong Nauie, the Romans found it altogether impossible either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolued once againe, notwithstanding their late misaduentures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of war. So causing fittie new Gallies to be built, & the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Attilius, & L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiuing that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwracke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they receiued by Xanthippus in Africa, were lesse daring than they had bin in the beginning of the warre: and withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italy, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cæcilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he remoued with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consull was better aduised. For when Asdrubal had made his approches somewhat neere the Towne, Cæcilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should aduance themselves, and passe ouer the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, & by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being enraged by their many wounds, they brake backe furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vterly disordered them. Cæcilius, espying this aduantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troupes, that stood embattailed, he vterly brake them, and put them to their heeles; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome, the whole State, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicily, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted foureteeen yeares. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolue to attempt Lilybæum, the onely place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily; and all (indeed) saue Drepanum, that was neere adioyning. They set down before it, and possesse themselves of all the places of aduantage neere vnto it, especially of such as command the haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe towres of defence; & by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, streets, and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, as the defendants begin to despaire. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, saileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, hee repairs with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reuealed by an Achean, called Alexan, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saued Agriumentum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexan, to assure the hired Souldiers, and imployeth Hannibal to appease the troupes of the Gaules, which did wauer, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vnderaken, are faine to liue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal the son of Amisear, for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible ioy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolue to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, & either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vndertakes the seruice; and hauing receiued his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Ægula, a little Iland neere Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shoores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipped his Oares (this Gallie being exceeding quick of sterage, & himselfe expert in all parts of the chan-nell) recovered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being encompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vndertake him. This enterprize, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre off, the aduerture which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of war will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no, though fortie peeeces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in peeces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke & Sweden were at War; our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, as forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subjects of his enemies, & he threatened to sink their ships if they came through the straits of Ellsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maiesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduerture, and sustaining some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, or sink them, at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burroughs, leading the way, did not onely passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with Artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Ellsenour, which at that time was not so well guarded, as now perhaps it is; and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound receiued. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Canon on the bancke of the Riuer; so well to purpose, and so near, with the face of the water, that hee thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown vp by any winde of glorie, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheefe, euen the poore

men, attending their profit when all things were extreame cleare in Antwerp, passed in boats of seven or twelue Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of flood fauoured them; as also with a contrary winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: so as hee was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the Riuer, to his maruailous trouble and charge.

The Port Saint Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596. when he entred the Port of Caliz; neither did the Port at Puntal, when we were entred, beate vs from our anchoring by it, though it playd vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanche, from five in the morning till twelue at noone. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be giuen for prooffe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Port is so set, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are driven to turne vpon it bow-line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vse, and fearefull: otherwise not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: Hee arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the state of Lilybaeum. Others also, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to choake the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sink them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they grownded so many of those great belied boates in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Island, in the passage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chase, and gathered vpon him; hee findes what shee is, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolved to fight with her. But shee is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybaeum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and warching. But in this despair there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lilybaeum, were ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier vndertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long siege, to starue the defendants.

Vpon relation of what had past, a supply of tenne thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, vnder M. Claudius, the Consull. Hee arrives at Messana, and marcheth ouer land to Lilybaeum: where having re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprize of Drepanum, a Citie on the oother side of the Bay of Lilybaeum. This seruice the Capitaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull embarks his troups, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouverneur of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybaeum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his spirits, hee perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be enclosed. Herewithall hee promisseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserue them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consull, deceived of his expectation, calls backe the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some rowe backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and follows his aduantage, and forceth the Consull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, hauing the land on his backe: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But hee was there by, and for want of Sea-room, so streightened, as he could not turne himselfe any way from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, hee thrust out of the Bay with

thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this seruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme three-score Gallies, with which they send away L. Iunius, their Consull, to take charge of their businesse in Sicil. Iunius arrives at Messana, where he meetes with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybaeum. One hundred and twenty Gallies hee had; and besides these, hee had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessarie prouisions for the Armie. With this great fleet hee arrives at Syracuse, where he staies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for some, that were too slow of saile, to keepe company with him along from Messana. In the meane time, he dispatcheth away towards Lilybaeum, his Quæstors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victualers, with some Gallies for their conveyance.

Adherbal was not carelesse, after his late victory: but studied how to vse it to the best advantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies hee deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had three-score and tenne more vnder his owne charge; and sent him to try, what good might be done against the Roman fleet, in the Haven of Lilybaeum. According to this direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where hee findes the Romans, more attentiu to the keeping in of the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne against another fleet. So hee chargeth them, boords, and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilco, Gouverneur of the Town, is not behinde hand, who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans to great distresse, giues Carthalo good leasure to goe through with his enterprife.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coast of Sicil, desiring how to worke mischiefe to the enemies; wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which he wisely managed. He was aduertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, neere at hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessels. These were the victualers, which the Consull Iunius, more hastily than prouidently, had sent before him towards Lilybaeum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their coming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make strong opposition, hee hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to seeke shelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder conert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to save them onely from the present danger, by lending them engines & other aide, whereunto they were bound. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride vnder those rockes, but would be forced by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to save their men, how they could, by taking land, with the losse of all their shipping. Whilst he was busied in this care, the Consull Iunius drew neere, and was discovered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Consull had neither meanes to flie, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger so great, as that of the enemies. The Carthaginian, seeing this, betakes himselfe to a Station betwene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to see which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicil, betwene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybaeum, a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde so formed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for so we doe in the West of England, before a Southerly storme) hastened to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauiage, and neuer found any soule weather in the entrailes of their treasts, their Sooth-sayers being all land-prophets, were suddenly ouer-taken with a boistrous South winde, and all the Gallies forced against the rocks, and vtterly wrackt.

This

This calamity so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved againe to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the seruice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make warre in an Island; against those that haue a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldom or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprises, with an intincible constancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Prouinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, haue bene the enemies, wherewith euery one of their most noble Discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many yeeres haue passed ouer some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more than one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift vndertakers, haue not bene disheartened. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they enioy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds warre with them sine yeeres. The Romans hauing emptied their common treasure, build a new fleet, at the charges of priuate men. The great victorie at Sea of Lucatius the Consull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to craue peace. The conditions of the peace betweene Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybaeum, and seeke to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Consull Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had received, bethought him what enterprises to vndertake. In the end hee resolved to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Island; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betweene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and Armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italie, did thoroughly repay the spoyle which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicill; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that serued fitly to infect the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betweene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not onely very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him opportunity, to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, waiting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicill he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeeres abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Hauing wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he vndertooke a strange peece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Seaside, by which hee conueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the midst of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) besieged. And no lesse was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeeres more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the prosecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hannibal, in Liuie, spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had vtterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held resistlesse, Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquired himselfe, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the triall of five yeeres warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was iudged equall, if not superior to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had bene deuised and gone, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; wherby, if the mastric of the Sea could once bee gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lacke of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treasure was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon priuate purses. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serue to doe the like, ioyned with some others, and laying their mony together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaid, when the war was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their paterne, that excellent swift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybaeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lucatius Catalus; who past with the same into Sicill, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, in deauouring by all means to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindefull of the late losses which his Predecessours had receiued; he was carefull to put himselfe in order, against their arriuall.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the art of seeming reuerend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, or things vndertaken by men more worthy than himselfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is auerse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by euery losse receiued. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grieuous oppressors of their subiect Prouinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned it all to their great losse. He had ere this bene employed against the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Rouer, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitiue Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsaile, when, hauing shewed himselfe an vnworthy Captaine, he betooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preserve the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deserued of his owne Countrey, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall he was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein hee reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which hee thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Nauie, with all needfull prouisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but he had neither beene carefull in trayning his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellowes. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans giue way: forgetting, that rather the resistance force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceiued aright, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to saile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading; and hauing thus lightened himselfe, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make his enemy repent of his new aduventure to Sea. This was a good course, if it could haue beene performed. But Catulus vsed all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this designe: not because he was informed of the enemies purpose, but that he knew it to be the best for them, & for that he feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was discried; yet he rather chose to fight with the enemy, that had the winde of him, than to suffer his conuoy to passe along to Eryx, vpon vnlkely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno should haue done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightened his Gallies of all vnecessary burthens; and he had taken aboard the choyce men of the Roman Land-souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter, were vtterly broken and defeated; hauing fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and sunke, and seuentie taken, wherein were few lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieronius.

The state of Carthage, vtterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolute. Meanes to repaire their fleet in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, vpon whose valour, and iudgement the honour and safetie of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicil, where hee could not bee relieved. In this extremitie, they make dispatch vnto Amilcar himselfe, and authorize him to take what course should seeme best vnto his excellent wisdom, leauing all conclusions to his election and sole counsaile.

Amilcar, whom no aduersitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recovery, had euer vanquished, looking ouer euery promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future hee was not able) resolved to make tryall, whether his necessitie might bee compounded vpon any reasonable termes. Hee therefore sent to Luclatius the Consull an Oueriture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present pouertie of the Roman State, wasted beyond expectation in the former warre, that hee willingly harkened vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearely abandon the Ile of Sicil. Secondly, that they should neuer vnder-take vpon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send backe into Italie, all the Romans, whom they held prisoners, without ranfome. Lastly, that they should pay vnto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteene hundred and twenty thousand crownes: the same to be delivered within twentie yeeres next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approued: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former sum; & required a shorter time of payment. Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians should not onely depart out of Sicil it selfe, but should also with-draw their Companies out of all other Ilands betweene it and Italie, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick warre, that had lasted about twentie foure yeeres without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwracke, about seuen hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about fiftie hundred: the greatest of which losses, doth serue to prouue the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the iudgement of Polybius; That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselves the brauer Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthy Captaine.

CHAP. II.

Of diuers actions passing betweene the first and second Punick Warres.

§. I.

Of the cruell warre begun betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

THE Romans hauing partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Ilands thereunto adiacent, gaue them rather meanes and leasure to helpe themselves in a following Warre, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quod leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are giuen by the Conquerours, and receiued of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made vnto them, by one of the Pruernates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this weightie businesse. For when one of Pruernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, what peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present aduantage vnto them; hee answered in these words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace bee good and faithfull that you giue vs, it will bee perpetual; if it bee ill, then of little continuance. To this answer, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiam; an credible voice, vnto any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an overburdened state, than mere necessitie did enforce. Now if the Romans themselves could make this iudgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour vnto themselves, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour receiued; than vntill they could recover their legges, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take revenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not onely private men, but Kings and publique States, haue more preuailed; than by any proper prowesse or vertue, hath held the rein from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punick War was ended, Amilcar, leauing Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conueniently the Armie might be transported into Africk: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gesto, to whom, as to a man of approued sufficiency, hee delivered ouer his charge. Gesto had an especial consideration of the great want, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them out (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that so the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arriued. Herein hee dealt prouidently. For it had not been hard to perswade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasurie did require: so that the first might haue beene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whilest their dis-iunction had made them them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would bee contented to gratifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due : and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers ; telling them, that they would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed ; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place where they might be lesse troublefome. This must bee done by some colourable words of perswasion : for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellowes, at Sicca : receiuing euery one a piece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge ; leauing behind them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came backe for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancie to their returning into the Towne ; and therefore compell them to trusse vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they remooued, with all their goods ; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arriual, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawne to mutinie : the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talk was, how rich they should bee, when all their money came in ; how much would fall to euery single share ; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians ; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten ; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, and so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away ; vntill the whole Armie being arriued, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich ; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all ; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought : with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them ; all which were to be considered in their Donatide. Hanno begins a very formall Oration ; wherein he bewailes the pouertie of Carthage ; tells them, how great a summe of money is to be paid vnto the Romans ; reckons vp the excessive charges, whereat the common-wealth had bene in the late warre ; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they bare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse : for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceived the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought ; they were all enraged, and fared like mad-men, so that nothing would serue to appease them.

Hanno would faine haue allswaged their furie, but he knew not how : for hee less vnderstood their dissonant lowd noyses, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of so many Countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred vp to mutinie, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning ; some, for want of skill ; others of set purpose ; and such as deliuer his errands in the worst sence, are best beleecued. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolute to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this mood they leaue Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne errour. It is a good rule,

Curandum

*Haue speciall care, that valiant pouertie
Be not oppressed with too great iniurie.*

But this proud citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath also bene carelesse in providing to secure her selfe against the inconuenience that might follow. Shee had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto she was like to giue cause of discontent, to ioyne it selfe into one bodie, when the seuerall troupes might easily haue bene dispersed : shee hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of these poore men, which had she retained in shew of kindnesse, she might haue vsed them as Hostages, for her own safety ; and by employing a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of Warre, shee hath weakened the reputation of her brauest Captaines, that might best haue serued to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be vsed as an instrument in defrauding his owne Souldiers of their wages : especially considering, that as he best could beare witnesse of their merits, so was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had bene willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsaile, vpon the liberall promises made by the Captaines. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their owne plor, and to deale the cardes which themselves had shuffled. Thus they continue to do as foolishly, as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis for the souldiours ; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send euer and anon some of their Senatours into the Campe ; who promise to satisfy all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreame to another, they make the Souldiours vnderstand, into what feare the Citie was driuen ; which cannot choofe but adde much insolencie to the passions already stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon growes wise, and finding the season fit, labors to make a great harvest. Money must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their horses, in publique seruice of the State. The State shall pay for them. They had liued some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiuing their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat, therefore what was this to the Carthaginians ? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision ; or their Captaine direct them, where to fetch it ? But this would not serue. They said that they had bene sometimes driuen to buy ; and that (since they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their provision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilest the Warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Muriners ; who might easily haue bene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the first. But now they make none end of craving. For whilest the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this Corn-monie, the Souldiers haue deuised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater sum of money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these controuersies which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condescended, and made choice of Gesco, partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africke : partly out of a dislike which they had conceiued of Amilcar, for that hee had not visited them in all this busie time. So Gesco comes among them ; and, to please them the better, comes not without money : which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calls vnto him first of all, the Captaines, and then the seuerall Nations apart ; rebuking them gently for that which had passed ; aduising them temperately concerning the present ; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained the Athenians, that their dominion over their subiects, was none other than a meere tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselves were a great Citie, and a popular state. Neither is it peradventure greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violence: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardlesse of his life and welfare; vnlesse himselfe be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very slaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuerthelesse, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of seuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seeke out bounds to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should haue riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hath enough: but (as Courtousnesse is neuer satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a stocke, though it were indeed a good yeerely In-come. Therefore he deuiseeth new tricks of roberie and is not better pleased with the gaine, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knowes it well: but he thinks by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vniustly, he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in feare, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore he can thinke vpon none other security, than to dis-arme all his Subiects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place, and for defence of his Person and state, to hire many lustie Souldiers as shall bee thought sufficient. These must not be of his owne Countrey: for if not enery one, yet some one or other may chance to haue a feeling of the publique miserie. This considered, he allureth vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vn honest that can be found, such as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to support him, by whose onely fauour they are maintained. Now left any of these, either by detection of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should bee drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to robbe, to rauish, to murder, and to satisfie their owne appetites, in most outrageous manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hatefull to all men else. Considering in what age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some Englishman perhaps that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this lease, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in need of mercenarie Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured vnto the Tyrant.

I. II.

That the tyrannie of a Citie over her Subiects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercenary Souldiers.

Now concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subiects: it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is iealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life: the lesse need hath she therefore, to secure her selfe by cruelty. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needs the lesse, to plucke from her Subiects. If warre, or any other great occasion, drue her to necessity, of taking from her Subiects more than ordinarie supplies of money: the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grieuous & hatefull, as those that are insolent; Remember (saith Chrysostome) the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Agrippina: that I may doe what I list, and be without guilt: whose words were accounted horrible, though wee did her no harme. And I cannot reckon it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame vpon her slaues; that while she was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances wherewith a dominating State offendeth her Subiects, are free from all sense of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of liberty make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that she should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villany, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

Altho this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, that the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Nor without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other priuate passions, are not very incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall haue need of the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome incestuous, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauity, might not hinder the people, from calling for a new bearded Courtisane, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practice and generally approved custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the priuate vertue or vice of any one man; nor by metaphysicall abstractions of the vniuersall from the singular, or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is composed. And I say therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, than vnder many thousands. The reasons prouing this, are too many to set downe: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident may reforme him; all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successour may proue better.

Many Tyrants haue bene changed into worthy Kings: and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent forme of Government, euen a lawfull Monarchy. But they that liue vnder tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope: their Mistress is immortall, and will not suffer the reines, vntill they be pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightier Chariotier. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindefull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall vpon the same foule put of which, others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends; who meane not to returne home empty to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honey. These flye into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with euery mans wealth, or wharsoeuer else, in all the Prouince, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becomming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endless labour (yet it must be vndergone) and such as euery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it? The loue of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successor of this man, he is more louing than could be wished, in respect of his Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction, at once, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goes, who seeks the ruine of all that haue bene mixed with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law. De Repetundis, or, Of Repetundis, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it serued not wholly to restrain their Prouinciall Governours, who presuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Prouinces, to worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of indignation. If the subiects of Rome groined vnder such oppressions; what must we thinke of those that were vassals vnto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthenstone tributes, tributes, they loved not to heare that their Empire was gricuous, they condemned many noble Citizens, for hauing bene ill Gouernours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly deuised by one Magistrate, serued as Presidents to inuade another, every man resolu'd to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and hee was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not extant: the gouernment of Verres the Roman in Sicill, that is liuely set out by Tullie, may serue to informe vs, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in feare of no such condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By persecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition; That a Citie cannot gouerne her subiect Prouinces so mildly, as a King: but it is enough to haue shewed, That the tyranny of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Sutable to the crueltie of such Lords, is the hatred of their subiects: and againe, suitable to the hatred of the subiects, is the ielousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vse the seruice of African souldiers, in Africk is selfe, they had rather be beholding to others, than were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick warre, shif his mercenaries out of their owne Countries; Vt Afri in Hispania, Hispania in Africa, melior procul ab domo futurum uereq; miles, uelut mutui pignoris obligati stipendia facerent. That the Africans might serue in Spaine, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were oblig'd by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries; for they were subiect vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not onely by reward, but by dutie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere desire of gaine, that made them fight, I will not nicely stand vpon proprietic of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

§. III.

The dangers growing from the use of Mercenarie Souldiers, and forraigne Auxiliaries.

THE extreame danger, growing from the imploiment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnsaithfull, disobedient, deuourers, and destroyers of all places and countries, whereinto they are damne, as being held by no other bond, than their owne commoditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they haue often; & in time of greatest extremity, not onely refused to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but revolted vnto the contrarie part, to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that haue trusted them. These Mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realme of Naples; with his Buckler without a sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan, who being entertained by Queene Iane of Naples, abandoned her seruice on the sudden, and forced her to put herselfe into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race Duke of Millan, who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaves, euen with the very same Armie which themselves had leuied for their owne defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the iust iudgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in losing his whole estate by the treacherie of such faithlesse Mercenaries, as his owne Father had bene. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Dutchie together with his person, into their hands, hee was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches vnto his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vsing the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. Wee see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes against his neighbour Princes; hee could neuer either by perswasion or force, set them againe ouer the sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian seruitude, that soon after followed.

followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had inuited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Egypt by Samar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Egypt, that Saladin his successor became Lord thereof, and of all the holy Land, soone after. What need we looke about for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The Brittaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrey, and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland, but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may be alledged, the good successe of the vnitd Prouinces of the Netherlands, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeed these Low countries haue many goodly & strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they haue seldome been able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek helpe abroad: and the like necessitie made them forbear to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the Warre: and therefore could ill spare vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercenarie souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witnesse it: and that braue Commander, Count Lozonwicke of Nassau, felt to his griefe, in his retreat from Groeningham, when in the very instant, that required their seruice in fight, his mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ranne away. This was not the onely time, when the hired souldiers of the States, haue either sought to hide their cowardize vnder a shew of greedinesse, or at least, by mere couetousnesse, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many monthes. I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur the Duke of Aniou, brother to the French King; saue that it is folly to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraigne Auxiliaries, needeth no better parterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples necke? Well, he liued to repent it, with griefe enough. Euen whilst he was counterfeiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginative sorrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towne to be surprized and wonne; the death of the Count S. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troupees, informed him better what had hapened; shewing that they were his own French, who stood in need of pitty. Then was his feigned passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; vvherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Uelas, mon Dieu, que voulez u faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serue to proue, that there is little danger in vsing mercenarie souldiers, or the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding, they were obedient vnto necessity, and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a king, partaker with them in the same danger, when the Queen of England refused to accept the Soueraignty of their Countrey, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continuall warre, when the heire of England reigned in Scotland, a king too iust & wise (though not engaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlands very safely repose confidence, in the forces of these their neighbour countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they should receiue, but well affected vnto the cause that they took in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, vnto the side vvhich he fought; yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his owne home, vvhich the English would haue rewarded him with death, if that his faith had bene corrupted.

by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer sort was relieued, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helpees, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, iniurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Countrie, of the same Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may such a Countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other businesse, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercenarie, and forraigne auxilinarie forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemye, against whom they are entertained.

†. II. III.

That the moderate government of the Romans gaue them assurance to vse the service of their owne subiects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the vse and benefit of the like moderation.

Here it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse seruice of other souldiers in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne Citizens: for if it were their manner to arme their owne subiects; how happened it, that they feared no rebellion; if strangers; how then could they auoid the inconueniences about rehearsed? The answer is, That their Armies were compounded vially of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subiects, as were either interested in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times (though seldome they did imploy so many,) ten Romane Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting: which serued to keepe in good order their subiects, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation, yet many priuiledges and immunities, which they inioyed, made them allured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie focuer, seemes troublesome to the necke that hath been accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of severall aduantages, to deliuer themselves from the Roman subiection. But still they haue been reclaimed by Warre, the Authors of rebellion haue sharply bin punished; and the people by degrees haue obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yea, in proceesse of time it was granted vnto many Cities, and those farre off remooued, euen to Tarsus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne, That all the Burgeses should be free of Rome it selfe. This fauour was conferred absolutely vpon some, vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subiects halfe of their tribute which they had been wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a ready way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the reuiue of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innouation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good government, That when some, for their well-defending, haue had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome, they haue refused it, & held themselves better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Petellia, a Citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to indure all extremitie of warre, than vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subiects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as hauing been faithfull to the vtmost. Such loue purchased these milde Gouvernours, without impairing their Maiesty thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their own, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning therunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other helpe of their own subiects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperity of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate vse of soueraigne power being so effectuell, in assuring the people vnto

vnto their Lords, and consequently, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practice of tyrannie, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity whatsoever: For it is lesse difficult, (whosoeuer thinke otherwise) and more safe, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honestie, than to turne aside from it, yet commonly our passions doe lead vs into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason, the same vnuly appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least-wile taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not so: for as much as we can hardly descry the passion, that is of force to insinuate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seldome bin hereditary, or long-lasting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which meanes the government hath bin reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? Why did the Athenians? Why haue many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good, how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were ledde hereunto by any affection, what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, diuided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diuersitie of temper, and the vehemencie of priuate hatred among them? Doubtlesse, we must be faine to say, That Tyrannie is, by it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; euery one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankinde, are common likewise vnto bruite beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are giuen by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise naturall, in conuenient measure, both vnto Mankinde, and to all creatures that haue sense; for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: euen so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuill forme of Iustice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vsefull. Neuerthelesse, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drukennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an vnproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions, as descend no lower than vnto bruite beasts, are held lesse vile; & perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grieuously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraved Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath been an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or That nothing should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist: yet the defectiue dulnesse, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate; whereas Tyrannie is more actiue, and pleaseth it selfe in the excesse, with a false colour of iustice. Examples of stupiditie, and vnaptnesse to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are euery where to be found: for this quality troubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some error of fortune, it incounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & felix felus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned vnto those, that know how Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the same of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrey. For Naransius, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion seruing to get the acquaintance and loue of so braue a man, which he much desired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all seruice. Amilcar ioyfully entertained this friend, promised vnto him his own daughter in marriage, and to wane from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naransius turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approach his own valour, to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were slaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellows, and foure thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius himselfe, with Autarius the Gaule, escaped to doe more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vawilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Couenant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarius, ascending to win from them, the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that not a man among them should dare, to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safetie, whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company, to respectiue onely of their priuate benefit, & carelesse of the generall good, had a purpose to betray them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; & that it was needfull, to look well vnto Gesco, & his companions, whom these traitors had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanitie of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a baite, wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemy Gesco would proue, if he might escape their hands. While hee is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autarius, and speakes his minde plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea the onely way, for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were deuising to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those that had a care of the war; that it were better to make an end of Gesco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course euery one should be engaged in the present Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that such as would speake here-against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarius was in great credit vwith the souldiers, & could speake sundry languages, in such sort, that he was vnderstood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gesco, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuerthelesse there were some, that for loue of Gesco, sought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither vvere they therevithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be serued in like sort: and that the subjects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: vvhich rule they obserued euer afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need say no more, than that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsaile of vsing it, it was like vnto the counsaile of Achitophel; All Israel shall heare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellows, if they be more innocent; and to auoid the punishment of lesse offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull spirits of those that haue been vvronged, are breeders of this desperation: to vvhich may be added, some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to the decree of their feuerall crimes. A coward thinkes all prouision too little for his owne securitie. If Phocas be a coward (saie the Emperour Mauritius) then is he murderous. To be stedfast and sure, in taking reuenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defensatiue against new iniuries. But vvrongfully: for it is opposit to the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise wife would haue repented; and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought so much wee to the Carthaginians, teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect euery their gentlenesse, as the introduction, to extreame rigour. Like vnto the errors of Princes & Governours, are the errors of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment, is awarded vnto the lesse offence, and vnto the greater; he that hath aduenced to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against these inconueniences, Mercy and Seueritie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his owne souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanitie was ready to inuice them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance, casting them vnto wilde beasts; to be deuoured.

Vwith this time Hanno, with the Armie vader his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilcar, & done little, as may seeme; for that nothing is remembered of him, for his losse. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his helpe, as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremity, as threatened vnto the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he ioyned his forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more than in former times: rather he could now performe nothing; such was the hatred between him and his vnworthy Colleague. The Towns of Vitea and Hippagreta, that had stood alwayes firme on the Carthaginian party, did now reuolt vnto the enemy, murdering all the souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The prouisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost inoule weather: and Carthage it selfe stood in danger, of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilest one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as was said) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages bene vsed, as the safest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities, Athenes & Rome; which other States and Princes haue often imitated, perswading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excel each other, will vse the greater diligence. They haue also ioyned two chiefe Obminders in equal commission, vpon this further consideration; the better to restraints the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For becof all Common-weales haue bene iequalous, hauing bene taught by their examples that haue made themselves Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that haue employed them. In this point, the Venerians haue bin so circumspect, as they haue for the most part trusted strangers, and not their owne; in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, serueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them trust; but in managing the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made ouer vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as were in one desire of Triumph, which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeers seruice; it is no matter, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end, than victory. Vvithal dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindred by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeede the manner, to send forth both the Consuls in one warre; but each went, whether his lot called him, to his owne Prouince, vnlesse one business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be ioyned in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times preuaile vwith their ioyne Generals: yet was this neuer or seldome, without as much conceit, as any of the vertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often bene such, that the lesse able Captaine, though of equall authority, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by ordering two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great and most dangerous overthrowes; whercof in the second Punicke warre we shall finde examples. On the contrary side, in their warres most remote, that were alwaies managed by one, they seldome failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appere. Now of those ten Generals, which serued the Athenians in the Battaille of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper beene better, than the iudgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Milvades: their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicill: the one being so ouer-warid, and the other so hallic, as all came to nought that they undertooke: whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, finding sole charge of all, did their Countrey and Common-weale most remarkable seruice. For it is hard to finde two great Capitaines, of equall discretion and valour, but that the one hath more of furie than of iudgement, and so the contrary, by which the best dodgions are as often ouerslipped, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was slaine after the Battaille of Iarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth, yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an aduantage, than a hinderance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, out-reach the aduisednesse of the other, as whatsoeuer the Admirall intended to win by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to lose, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

Thus we neede no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: who, though they were still sicke of their ill-grounded loue to Hanno, and were vnwilling to disgrace him, yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armie that serued vnder them: The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Campe which he did, & Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho & Spendius had brought their Armie nere vnto the Citie, and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much, hauing in their Campe about fiftie thousand; besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuerthelesse, the Citie was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victualls they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Pyrrhus, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicill hee assisted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne, because if no other State gaue the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principalltie of Syracuse would soon be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some slender assistance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a shew of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeite, as the sequels manifestly proued.

While Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligently waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more streightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desert from their valie attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issued into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captaine assisting the rebellious, took vpon them to finde Amilcar worke, leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naravasus, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore he betooke himselfe to his former method of warre, keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the streightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it selfe, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to many skirmishes, in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giuing them the overthrow in plaine battaille: vntill at length he got them into a streight, whence they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough to perceiue their owne disadvantage: and therefore they had the losse of the first fight, fight; but a waiting for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them, to dare impossibilities, vsed the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not: and hauing spent all their victualls, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffred patiently, as knowing that they had not deserued any fauour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremitie, that they were faine to deuoure their own companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken, and they threatned their Capitaines with what they deserued, vnlesse they would goe forth to Amilcar, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarcas, and Antaricus, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their owne Companions. Hereupon they sent to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilcar in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seemes that they tooke the blame vpon themselves, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should chooseth out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, & so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to armes. But they wanted Capitaines to order them, and the same astonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the reuolted Cities of Africke. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naravasus, and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeeld: Utica, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon feare of deferred vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of the enemy. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the wals; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the siege began, as if speedy victory had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents, and therefore it behooued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the wals beheld his owne destinie, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to auoide it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So hee brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and v unexpected furie he sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner, on vvhom, and thirte the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently reuenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the siege, but vvas faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terror was no lesse within Carthage, vpon the fame of this losse; than had beene the ioy of the late great victory. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; vvhom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Capitaines suruiuing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the employment of one sole Generall, nere vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hallic exigent, to deuise about re-pealing it. But thirty principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day.

day. It neerely touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Neuerthelesse after many conferences, the authority of the Senators preuailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this war lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the meane season Matbo was come abroad, as meaning to vse the reputation of his late successe, whilest it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did; but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matbo, that he resolved to try the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his owne desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matbo: as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approved it selfe in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision: inuiting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this battaile might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matbo, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring spirits, which had bin well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as hauing beene often victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of liberty should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future & present good lay all at once engaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians won a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeilded; and Matbo himselfe was taken aliue. Immediately vpon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vtica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victours. Matbo and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this warre. The war had lasted three yeares, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subiects did not loue them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, haue preuented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driuen out by the Islanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the pence.

WHilest Matbo & Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bellar the Gouverneur, & other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vse. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Armie (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuiued on the sudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to ioyne themselves with those that were already revolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that common-weale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith vvas suspected. Wherefore, to take away all ieaousie and distrust, they resolved to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that haue vnderaken the quarrell of an vnjust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the iniquitous purposes which they haue in hand: It is indeede the best payme, that desperate men can deuise to each other, to performe some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kinde of cruelty, did the vngovernable Carthaginians murder a Garrison of Chians, sent vnto them for their defence against the Didemonians, by Aratus; vvhio, vvhon he had formerly possesst himselfe of their Citie, by right of war, did not onely spare the sacke and spoyle therof, but gaue them equall freedome, with the rest of the Citie vniued. These Reuolts are also common in our Court wars; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destructions of old friends, we cannot be receiued and trusted by old enemies. Cesont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than Spendius, and his associates: only they wanted a Matbo among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Islanders were no lesse glad, than the Didemonians, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they could not agree about the proportion of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the soldiers for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the soldiers were of opinion, that the ringle of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, between Spendius with his Mercenaries, & their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vvhich the riches of Carthage had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrie, the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which now they were dealt; I know not, but finally the Mercenaries were driuen out, and compelled to saue themselves in Italie. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it, with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicily. Yet this offer was refused; vpon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matbo and Spendius with come: of whom the Carthaginians tooke almost fise hundred, and held them in prison. Herof vvas made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yeilded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vtica, offering it selfe vnto their subiection. This might haue serued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the issue proued, that it was meer regard of greater profit, vvhich kept them so temperate; no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should haue done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had bin ouerthrown by Spendius or Matbo, in one maine battaile, that mighty Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of mercilesse villaines, or haue diminished her selfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreame necessitie, whereinto Matbo reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not far from such a miserable choyce. Wherefore it was not vnwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a Rebel, but sinking ship, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia, then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recouered her feet againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced vvar against this enfeebled and impouderished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeede against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to resist; and therefore yeilded to the Roman demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talents, in recompence belike for I see not what reason they could alleadge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of vvarre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the mony vvas paid, how hardly soeuer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punicke faith, in breach of Couenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposed to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

S. V.

How the affaires of Carthage went betwene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke Warre.

THe iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; serued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson; That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolute to be obedient vnto those that were more mighty. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easily took place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance & Empire. The strength, and the ieaousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts vpon the Mediterranean seas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknewen to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repaire their decayed forces, vwith all needefull supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and souereigne trust was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom his Country did wholly repose it selfe, in hope to recouer strength by his meanes, that had saued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to be the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weale; they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually vpheld & enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coasts of Spaine; in which Country, during nine yeares that he liued there, he subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Prouinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) he was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his son in law vvas made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of vvarre; but farre better in practice and cunning than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subiects and confederates therunto, that the Romans began to grow ieaous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granada, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it neerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicily, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if he request, since his request shall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans vtterly destitute of all good colour, that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprize of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparant, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had bin suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceede any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they seeme to haue hoped, that howsoeuer the generalltie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to auoide all occasion of warre with Rome yet the brauery of one man might proue more fastidious, and presenting the iniurie, returne such answer, as would intangle his whole Countie in the quarrell, that they so much desired, and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparant cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would haue this insolent countenance inserted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and sought no further.

If it had beene so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal; yet should it not haue stood bound in honour, to obserue the same carefully, vnlesse an oath had also bin extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, vnder the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace, whereof the Romans might be accused more iustly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of periuice, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wan some reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistresse ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiuing blowes from a stouter Dame; their were loone found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-seruants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, & were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their societie; and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome.

Neuerthelesse, if we consider the late agreement, made with Asdrubal; we shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest color of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spaine: in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countie. Howsoeuer it were, this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of help from a more mighty Citie. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spaine eight yeares: (being slaine by a slave, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

The

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reigne of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punick war, and the vacation following, betwene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, vvherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre vveaker, as in an after-spring. The whole Countrie had recovered by degrees, a forme of libertie: the petty tyrannies (bride of those inferiour Capitaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not only serued to defend themselves, but to giue protection to others. This conuersion to the better, proceeded from the like dissentions and tumults in Macedon, as had bin in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach vpon it. For after many quarrels and great wars, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betwene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lyfimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie yeares; yet so, that he was diuers times thence expelled, not only by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath bin already shewed, but by Alexander the son of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly won it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his souldiers, euen at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gauls, he was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, vvhom he compelled to receive his Gar rifons. But his young sonne Demetrius raised an Armie, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; vvhich was iustly termed the fittur of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a steepe rockie hill on the North side of the towne, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the town, which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betwene the Aegean and Ionique Seas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the son of Polyperchon; and after his death, Crateipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made betwene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of vvhom I finde nothing else, than that he vvas thought to be poysoned by this Antigonus, who deceiued his wife Nicæa thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The deuice was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, vvilling him to court Nicæa, and seeke her marriage. The foolish old widow perceiued not how vnfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as ready, to consent, as vvas his son to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hercupon all Corinth vvas filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the midst of vvhich, Antigonus vvatched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Lady, whose icalousie had bin exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauity befeeming his old age. But as he had stolen it; so vvas it againe stolen from him: neither liued he to reuenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the son of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeares. He made greater prooue of his vertue before he was King than after. The Dardaniens, Ætolians, and Acheans, held him continually busied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only son of Demetrius, vvas a young child when his father died; & therefore Antigonus, his vnckle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince;

Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own son, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus vvas called the Tutor, in regard of his protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as, will-gine, because he was slow in his liberalitie. He repressed the Dardaniens and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reigne. Vpon confidence of this good seruice, he took state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but vvere soone appeased by faire words, and a seeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouvernment. The Achaiens tooke from him the City of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not bin endangered by a neerer enemy. But ciuill dissention, which had ouerthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew it easily now againe; when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sicknesse; and gaue to this Antigonus no lesse authority therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaiens from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greekes. By the equallie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be gouerned by one Law, and to vse one and the same sort of weights, measure, and mony.

Achaia, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had bin by the Macedonian Capitaines diuided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subiected themselves, after the descent of the Heraclide, which Vysamenus the son of Orestes posselt the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with some small changes according to the diueritie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, wherof Helice, and Burro Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battails of Leuctras; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a war, no lesse foolish than cruell, among themselves. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomie the son of Lagus, Lyfimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomie Cumanus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimai, vnited themselves, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, vvhich after followed. For hauing bin, some of them Partisans with sundrie Macedonian Capitaines, and others hauing bin grouerned by petty Kings, they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italie. Now after the vuniting of the Patrenses and Dimai, to whom also the Cities of Tritæa, and Phars, ioyned themselves; Ægira chased out her Gar rifons: and the Borians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for sometime and fure yeares, vsed the same forme of Gouvernment with the Achaiens; who by a Senatorie and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and soone after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Cæcilius was the first, and Archeus the second.

This Archeus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who liuing at Argos in exile, vvhilst his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of some banished men, to enter their own Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrants, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greekes, than in looking to his own. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the league, which though at that time it received more increase by their accession, than it added strength to them, yet the benefit of this conuention serued well enough against against Antigonus, whose subtiltie was somewhat greater than his valour. [As the industry and counsaile of Aratus deliuered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league, so further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of 150 talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuersies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, & the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The mony he obtained of Ptolomy Euergetes King of Egypt, who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conuersation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sceyon excelled.]

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wanne by night, being thereinto guided by some theuees that he had hired for the purpose, who liuing in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasure, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was he faine to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed Antigonus his Souldiers were rather overcome by their owne feare, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and hauing lost the advantages of the place already, vpon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemie.

In these kinde of night-seruices, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was verie cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, he was astimorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approued) might looke pale and tremble, when he began battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diuersified, by the sundry natures of men, & in a manner confined, vnto seuerall sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vse, good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrie he was vnreproucable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truly testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians reuolted soone after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Trachinians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew so powerfull, that it aduentured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos & Megapolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise vpon the Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the Citie by shew of loue; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest slaues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue lent any helpe to the recovery of their owne freedome; sundry times, and with diuers euents, they fought with the Tyrants, (who roste vpon one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: vnill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was forsaken, perfwaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he consented to resigne his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermonia, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phlians.

Whilest this businesse with the Argines was on foot, Lysidas the Tyrant of Megapolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen Generall of their forces (which was a yearely Office, and might not be hold two yeeres together by one man:) euery second yeare, for a certaine while, he and Aratus succeeded one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and now Citizens, Lysidas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the generall good, in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appeare in due time.

The Achaens hauing obtained so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolomy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land, made open War vpon Demetrius the son of Antigonus Gonatas, for the liberty of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in signe of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in vvhom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter seruit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in seruice, or insolent in command. Neuerthelesse when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by mony, which he could not by force; & corrupting the Capitaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, vvhom thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaens, louing them, and speaking vvell of them, vvhich was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worne glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by iustice and honestie; so did the Etolians, in the viter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it selfe, waxe very powerfull, by sturdinesse of body, & rude courage in fight, without help of any other vertue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to do & suffer much; partly by the naturall strength & fastnesse of their Country; but especially by the benefit of the time, vvhich called away these famous Capitaines to other businesse, as hath bin related. They had molested Cassander in fauour of Antigonus, & vvere themselves as much plagued by him, & by the Acarnanians, a little, but a stout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the son of the first Antigonus, & more or lesse, with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often War vvvith the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirians, & many Citiees in Peloponnesus: so that they vvere hardned with perpetuall traualle; seldome putting off their Armour. But their hardinesse ill deserued the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship; measuring all things by their own insolent wils, & thinking all people base-minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Etolians had lately made great spoyles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Country. They had inuaded the friends of the Achaens, taken and sacked Pallene, where although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gaine made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Country wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another vway, by Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they vvere driuen to seeke helpe of the Achaens; which they obtained. The vvar vvhich the Achaens made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit therof redounded chiefly vnto the Etolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby vvere the Macedonian forces diuered from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Etolians giuing thanks in words, deuided how to requite the benefit with some great mischiefe. They saw that the Achaens were desirous, to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance & Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedemonians were very calous. Wherefore these Etolians laboured earnestly, to set the Lacedemonians and Achaens together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called in to helpe (it skilled not on what side) and so get no small share, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that this Kingdome had sustained by the Achaens. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedemonians cause to take Armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had bin meddling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedamon: and thereby had prouoked the Lacedemonians to looke about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaean.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subiect to the iniuries of any longer Neighbor. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Etolians entering Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand flaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Auarice & Lukerie reigned among them; the poore was oppressed by the rich, & the generositie of spirit, that had sometime bin his generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seven hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands; all the rest were needie people, and desirous of innovation. Heraipon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict obseruation of Lycurgus, his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall diuision of Lands: All the younger, and pooreer sort were glad of this; but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends & Counsaillors in this enterprize, abused his good meaning to their owne priuate commoditie. They were haſtie to take away all debts, & cancell all bands, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the diuision of lands they afterwards hindered, because their own possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, vvhich these men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdom; and the two aduerſe Kings driuen to take Sanctuary, out of vvhich, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into priſon, and thereby his enemies condemned & strangled, together with his Mother, & his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vsing their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; & ſetued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adioyne Lacedamon to the Achaens Common-wealth: though it were great iniustice to take such aduantage, and attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus; and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could haue bin wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did also requite the iniust attempts of the Achaens, euen in their own kinde: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, should haue bin the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas hauing thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in marriage (perforce) to his own son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, & sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, & by pitying his misfortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilest he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenaum, a Temple on the marches of Luconia, to vvhich both they & the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegæ & Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedemonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labor of a painful nights trauel, & discovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing forrie. By these degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, & therefore would haue staid the quarrell from proceeding too far. But Lyſiadas & Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so virgent. Aristomachus was at that time Generall of the Achaens, (He and Lyſiadas being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannie) who sent vnto Aratus, lying then in Artemis, and required his assistance in a iourne to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would he therefore therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus who desired to giue battaile. Yet had the Achaens twenty thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedemonian, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus, which Lyſiadas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuerthelesse the Achaens would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the yeare following, against Lyſiadas his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behooued him to confute, with deedes, the slanderous words of Lyſiadas. Therefore he purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, neere vnto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himselfe all night for feare; so that he was thought to haue bin slaine. This misadventure Aratus recompenced by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue bin expected, had he bin victorious. For whilest there was no suspition of any great matter that he could vndertake; he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. These Mantineans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before ioyned themselves with the Achaens; but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gaue themselves to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus wonne. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achaen societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus, so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered neere vnto Megalopolis, where the Achaens had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his aduantage. Thereupon Lyſiadas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedemonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driuen backe vpon their owne Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Armie was disordered and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the Achaens against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuerthelesse, wherein though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achaens being wearie, and the Spartan King intentiue to another businesse.

Cleomenes hauing ledde into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull iournies, forooke the Achaen warre on a sudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where he slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gaue he an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched vpon the power of Kings, & many disorders had grown in the Citie; he iustified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall diuision of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in need of Mercenarie helpe, as it lately had done, to saue it selfe from the Ætolians, Thyrians, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any aduantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Achaens hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the Citie, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrie of Argalopolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinea; and ready to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, he proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed and by better men. His Lacedemonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principalltie of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the possession of a few Townes: but aduentured to wiane or lose all.

all. The Ætolians, in fauour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantinea, Tegea, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrey, and saw that Antigonus, with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore he deuised how to provide against the worst, and rather to repaire all, or (if it could not be) to saue all from utter ruine. The office of General when it was next put vpon him, he refused; fearing to be so far prest, as to hazard in one battaile all the force of his Countrey, to which as he had neuer any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted to by surprise, & defended vpon the aduantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the Weale-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it seemed that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of battaile; that Mantinea had not onely opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but slaine the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Archeans, was now reuolted vnto the enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolomie was too farre off to helpe; and the neere-ness of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be vsfull, if this King would, (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall heereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpose; and instructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the Acheans.

The Citie of Megalopolis had bene well affected to the Macedonians, euer since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some speciall benefits. At this time it lay neerest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deferred succour; yet could not well be releued by the Acheans, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leaue and good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lacke of what else to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecessors; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to giue them aide. But when they deliuered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had giuen them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Acheans vnder the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentive care to their discourse. He embraced the motion: and to giue it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the Acheans good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers to Aratus, assuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceiued, not to haue bene grounded vpon any hatred to the Macedonians, but onely vpon a iust and worthy loue to his owne Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Acheans were glad to heare, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisdome of his Countrymen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safetie: adding neuertheless, that it were not amisse, first of all to try their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that hee had not bene Author of this Decree, but onely followed, and that leisurably, the generall consent.

Neuertheless

Neuertheless in true estimation, this finenesse of Aratus might haue bin vsed, vwith his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had bin more honourable, to make an end of the War, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: since thereby he should both haue freed his Countrey from all further trouble; & withall should haue restored vnto the vniuersall state of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pitty) that Vertue hauing risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principality, by length of time, and successe of many actions, can ill endure the hasty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it selfe likely to be ouer-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedemonians there was none, than that they lately had bin in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should preferre Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was lustily plagued, vwhen he saw his own honours reuerfed by the insolent Macedonians; and instead of liuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posterity of Heracles was faine to do sacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a god; and was finally poysoned by Philip, whose Nobility was but of fine descents, & whom perhaps he might haue seene his fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality, as he had vsed to the Acheans; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more wary both in trusting and disbursing. Cleomenes himselfe, vvhilest this businesse with Antigonus was a-foot, passed through Arcadia with an Armie; and laboured by all means to draw the Acheans to battaile. At the Citie of Dyme in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation, with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the Macedonians. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them, where he had so great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamitie was such, that Aratus himselfe durst not take vpon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Acheans were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted vpon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in warre. Hereunto if they would condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, & all his prisoners ransom free: also that they should enjoy their own Lawes & Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Acheans: who desired him to come to the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had euer bin since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea or since the Persian inuasion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, & thereupon fell extreame sicke, & so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neuertheless he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Acheans, in their desire of his friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Antigonus was violently bent against it; & fought by great words, & terrible threats, to make his Countrymen afraid of resolving. When all would not serue turne, he betooke himselfe to his cunning, and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should do well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiuing hostages for safetie of his person. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this aduertisement: and tooke it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had bin an easie matter, to haue told him so much at the first, and not haue made him come so far with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seemed to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners, who sought thereby, either to make him waite without the Citie, and deale only with themselves and their Messengers; or if he would aduenture himselfe into the Citie, then to deprive him of all Royall shew, that might breed respect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, & for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person: lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes, ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, and finish the bargain without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these juggling trickes: and Aratus was not farre behind within him, in as bitter an Oration. So betwene feare of the one, and reuerence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake vp, leaving all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his advantage of their present weakness, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yeelded vnto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time; but come presently to relieue the distressed Achaens. Antigonus gaue good words as could be wished: saying that hee vtterly refused to doe anything, vnlesse hee might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enemy the Stagge: but with condition, that the horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contended, but wanted all honest colour to doe it; seeing the Corinthians had no way deserued, to be thus giuen away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what hee intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that their Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the Barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnesus; promising that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would he giue him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receiue of King Ptolomie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraignie of the Country; hee desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be jointly kept by the Lacedemonians and Achaens. All this entreaty serued to no purpose. For Aratus, reflecting vtterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achaens, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seized vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, wherof this his Aduersary was natue.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neere to the Isthmus; hauing passed with his Army through Euboea, because the Etolians held the streights of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this iourney. At his comming thither he found the Lacedemonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battaile, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to doe: he secretly got into the Corinthian Hauen; but was violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally he resolved to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no lesse troubled his enemies. The Achaens were gotten into that Citie; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driuen out of the Citadell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present helpe. Argos had alwayes bin enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, he forbore to chafe out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that hee would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places where it would haue been tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, began to turne good Common-wealths, men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achaens; assailed his Garrison; cut in peeces the Rescue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to forsake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he vnderstood by continuall messages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost lost; he began to feare, lest his labour in guarding the entry, should grow fruitles; the Achaens in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsooke his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could saue, he meant to trust torture with the rest. And so farre he preuailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argiues and Achaens were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets; when the horsemen of Antigonus were disquered a farre off, hasting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as soone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, than to make a safe retrait. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which he had bin long in getting.

Antigonus hauing shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he vvan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes; and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he tooke his vway to Aegium, where was held a Parliament by the Achaens; to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue words, that filled them with hope. The Achaens were not behinde with him; but made him Capitaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into covenant with him, That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only tasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes that would haue bin a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen vpon the Achaens. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one only left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreaty. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spitefull. Neuerthelesse in taking reuenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the ayde of these Macedonians. For with extreame torments he did put Aristomachus to death, vwho had bin once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achaens, and from them reuolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Achaens. For he slue all the principall Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bondslaves: diuiding the spoile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The town it selfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argiues: who peopled it with a Colony of their own, and Aratus hauing charge of this businesse, caused it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse, than euen the flattery, wherinto they had vrged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite. But leauing to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill state of the Achaens; Let vs returne into his warre against the Lacedemonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantineia, Orchomenus, Heraca, and Telphussa; Mantineia he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achaens: with whom he wintred at Aegium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territorie. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantineia, & to those other Townes that he wan, vvas this: He had few Souldiers, and had not mony enough to wage more. Ptolomie the Egyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, vnlesse he might haue Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Egypt, yet the aide came not. For Ptolomie vvas slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore prouided for himselfe, as well as his own ability would serue. He manumised all the Heilotes, which vvere the Lacedemonian slaues: taking mony for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Hauing thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus neere at hand in Argo. The towne he wan: but after he was entred, all that vvere fit to beare Armes, rose hastily against him; and though they could not driue him out, yet saued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and goods to them againe, if they would be of his party. But they brauely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Acheans, at Argium: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes vvas safely gone home. Therefore he returned them backe to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos; there to passe the rest of his vn lucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Acheans. When he had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes vvas at the gates; with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argines perceiuing that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field; vvere very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he vvas wiser than to be moued with their clamors, and suffered them to see their villages burnt, to bid him resigne his Office of Protector vnto some that vvere more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish words, rather than he vould be ouer-come in fight, and thereby lose more honor than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakening the reputation of his enemy: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, vnto Lacedamon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for war, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to requit these brauado's of his enemy, vvith the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the vvar from his own gates; and therefore entred vpon the Country of Argos, where he made such haucke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Country of the Argives, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligythi; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Tuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yetserued to dis-hearten the Achean side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting vp his rest, without any more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gauls, Epirotes, Boeotians, Acaruanians, and others; together vvith the Acheans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, vvith which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus coming vnto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and between the hills of Eua and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, vvich he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army, in assaying their well-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted vvith his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eua. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achean foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foote, incamped in the streight vally between those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts, and not onely disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Enclydas, his brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground afforded; whereon he lay. Philopamen the Arcadian of Megalopolis who afterwards proued a famous Capraine, serued then on horse, as a priuate young man, among the Acheans. He seeing that all was like to go to rout, if their Illyrians were driuen to fall back vpon the Army following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achean horse, to breake vpon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places, untill they receiued a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiuing them to be more orderly, than wel aduised; entreated some of his own Countreimen to follow him, and charge on the Spartans; & forced them, not only to leaue the Illyrians, but secke how to saue themselves. Being so far aduanced, he found the place vvich the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be wonne, through the skilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore he allighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to do the like: the folly of Enclydas being manifest, vvho kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon euenn termes. So he recoured the Hill top; where though he was sore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Army came vp to him; by vvich the Lacedemonians were beaten from it, vvith great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Enclydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: vvho fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himself, vvas like to haue bin surrounded and lost, if he had not vvithdrawn himself vvith an extraordinary speed. In this battaile ended the glory of Lacedamon, vvich, as a light ready to goe out, had vvith a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left, of sixe thousand Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeld themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he hastned away to the Sea-side (vvhere he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) & imbarqued himselfe for Egypt. He vvas lovingly entertained by Ptolomie Evergetes; who vnderooke to restore him to his Kingdome, and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted vvith his gallant behauiour and qualities. In the meane season he had a pension allowed him, of foure and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolomie died, and his son Ptolomie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, vvholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vvithout full of all vertue, and hating any in vvhom it vvas found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, vvich the troubles in Peloponnesus, did seeme to inuade him; Ptolomie and his Minions, vvould neither giue him aide, nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his own friends in Greece, because he vvas too vvell acquainted vvith the weakenesse of Egypt: nor vvell knew how to detain him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him, vvas; that vvith thirty of his Countreimen, he vnderooke a desperate enterprise: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrines to rebell and seeke their liberty. In vvich attempt he slue some enemies of his that he met; and hauing vvalked vp and down the streets vvithout resistance (no man offering to take his part, or vvich is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) he, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Vpon his dead body Ptolomie vvvas bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had bin sent thither as Hostages, together vvith the vvives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such vvas the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, vvho had caused Spis, vvith his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloody end, as now befell his own Wife, Son, and Grand-children.

After the victory at Selasia, Antigonus vvithout resistance, entred Sparta: vvherein no force of any Enemy, before him, could make vvay. He kindly entreated the Citizens, and left them to their own Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer than two or three daies; after which he hastened out of Poloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure vvas, an aduertisement that he receiued out of Macedon; how the Illyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrey. Had these newes come a litle sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few daies longer, or at least-wise tarried a few daies after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedemon vould haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonius fought a great battaile vvith the Illyrians, and ouercame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any vvound, but by ouer straying his voyce; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, vvho vvas troubled before vvith a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolomie Philopater; began to reigne in Asia, and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolomie, though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuteen yeares of his reigne. The vvrippinge of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is vviall in the minoritie of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted vvith the Romans; vpon vvhich occasion, vvhen it comes, vve shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece, and how they were subdued by the Romans.

W Hilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselves work among the Sardinians and Corseans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made also war vvith the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour vvith little pain. With the Gauls, they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Linie saith, a tumult than a vvwar. So that by all these light exercises their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, it hath bin shewed before: of their dealings vvith Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meete to be vtterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Countrey now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making war for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to help the Mydionians, his friends, that were besieged by the Aetolians; for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrians succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Aetolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, vvho was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honour of the victory, and the diuision of the spoyle to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and won the towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, vvho thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had vvon the victories, vvich anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Aetolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus: That the old, & the new Prætor, should be ioynly intitled in the victorie, and haue equal authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, & after another fashion. They arriued, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Aetolians, and though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own busines, but stoutly sallied out of the Towne. Many of the Aetolians were slaine, more vvere taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoyle, & went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Aetolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage, highly pleased Agrippa King of the Illyrians: not onely in regard regard of the mony, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; for of the booty that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the stoutest of the Gauls, he found it not vn easie, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the like vvildlike. For he took this he feared, and drank so immoderately, that he fell into a Fluxurie, vvich in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdome, together vvith his great hopes, he left vnto Tolomy, his wife.

Tolomy gaue her people free liberty, to rob all sorts at Sea; making no difference between friend and foe; as if she had bin sole Mistresse of the Ionian Waters. She armed a fleet, and sent it into Orontus, vvilling her Captaines, to make vvare vvhere they found advantage, vvithout any further respect. These fell vvith the vvesterne coast of Poloponnesus; vvhere they invaded the Eleans, and Messeniens. Aftervvards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed in the Citie of Phenice, vvith their vvictualles and other necessities. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Gauls; that hauing bin Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrippa, then Pyrrus, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they neuertheless revolted, and were for their misdeedes disarmed & cast into Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirians, and trusted to lye in Garrison vvithin their Towne. The Gauls vvere soon growne acquainted vvith the Illyrians, vvho vvith whom they betrayed Phenice; vvich obstructed none other in trusting them. All Epirus vvvas presently in armes, and hastened to driue out these vvelcome guests. But whilest the Epirians lay before the Towne, that came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that vvvas marching thitherward by Land, vvnder one Scerdilaides, vvho vvvas whom Queen Teuta had sent to help his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigenia, to make good that Towne, & the streights adioyning, by vvhich these new commers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, sped vvell in their businesse. For Scerdilaides found meanes to ioyne vvith his fellowes; and they that vvere besieged vvithin Phenice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirians, as made them despaire of liuing their Countrey, vvithout great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors vvvere sent to the Aetolians and Ætolians: craving their help, vvith very pittifull tearmes of chreatie. They obtained their suite; neither vvvas it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, vvvas ready in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdilaides. But Scerdilaides vvvas called home, by letters from Teuta the Queen, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no mnde to put his forces to hazard, but offered composition, vvich vvvas accepted. The agreement vvvas, That the Epirians might ransom their Towne, and all their people that vvvere prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, vvith all their booty and slaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargaine, the Illyrians returned into their own Countrey by Land, sending their booty away by Sea. At their coming home, they found no such great trouble; as that vvich they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Merchants, vvilest they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, vvvere so frequent, that Embassadors vvvere sent to require of Teuta, that she should abstaine from doing such iniuries. These Embassadors found her very iolly; both for the riches vvich her fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, saue only the towne Issa, vvich her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling vvith this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans; that found fault vvith her doings, and calling them by a true name, Pyrracy, required amends. Yet vvhen their speech vvvas ended, she vvouchsafed to tell them, That iniury in publike she vvould do them none: as for priuate matters, no account vvvas to be made of them; neither vvvas it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadors) we Romans haue a manner, & a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publicke, of those priuate wrongs that are borne out by publike authority: therefore vve shall teach you, God vvilling, to reforme your kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These vvords the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, vvithout all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be slaine: as if that had bin the way, to set her heart at rest; vvich vvvas indeede the meane to disquiet and affraid it more after.

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this iniurie is of such nature, as must be requir'd with mortall war. It is indeede contrary to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to be this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of vvar and destruction, therefore it vvas equally receiued by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadours should passe freely, & in safety, between enemies. Neuerthelesse, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State, lay hold vpon Embassadours sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadours (thus employed, to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, & subiects of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slew the Lacedemonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a vvar vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, vvith practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law vvhatsoever. For vvhereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour do it without incurring iustly the same danger of punishment, vvith other Traitors, in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Ciuitians, and go on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Cornelianus.

The Illyrian Queen vvvas secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She vvvas indeed in an error; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Having more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirians had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had she easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; & that neuerthelesse, it preuailed as much, by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; she vvould haue continued to vse her advantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, vvith such good caution, that she should not haue needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But she vvvas a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Phares, with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe, & one part of it fell with Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium, vvvas almost surpris'd by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In Corcyra the Illyrians landed, wasted the Isle, and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achaïans, vvvere called in to helpe: vvho came, and vvvere beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcius Caryneus, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Town of Corcyra, disinclined vvith this ouerthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Phariis, vvho tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison, sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Tenta vvvas angry with her Captaine Demetrius; I know not why; but so, as he resolved to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans vvvere euen ready to put to Sea, though vncertaine which vvay to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it vvvas, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; vvhere he found the Town of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only receiued him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consull sailed along the coast, to Apollonia, accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsailler and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Armie, numbered at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperse themselves.

From

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queene Tenta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Rison, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leaue the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staies behinde, and prosecutes the war, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to beg peace: which she obtained vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, & pay tribute for the rest; & from thenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of war, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian war, the Romans sent Embassadours into diuers parts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made war with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, & therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, saue a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the warre betwene the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italic.

The Gauls that dwelt in Lombardie, vvvere the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes vvith their own forces, and sometimes vvith the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that war proued not answerable to the beginning, if we may giue credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they receiued; and if they got any victory, it yeilded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduised: lightly stirred vp to vvar, and lightly giuing ouer. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that vvvas past, lesse than vvomen. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwayes carefull heede to their approach, vvvere it only bruted. For the danger of them vvvas sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, vvvere called warres, but tumults Gallici, tumults of the Gauls: and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italic, and vsed to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion serued to disperse them. Having receiued an ouerthrow; they would rest ten or twelue yeares, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred vp again, by younger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made only defensue vvar, had leisure to grow, by setting vpon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls neuer fell vpon Italic with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was traouailing in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punicke wars: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it seemes that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italic, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therfore like to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punike Warre. Once before this, the Romans had bin bold, to set vpon the Gauls in their own Country: and that was three yeares before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italic. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, inuading Hetruria, and besieging Arretinum, had with a great battaile, and slaine L. Cæcilius with the most of his Armie. Mannius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransome of prisoners. But these

c Apollonia, a Citie neere Dyrrachium, or Durazzo, vpon the Sea-coast. Pyrrhus called it Sissypolis.

e There were diuers nations of the Boij; as in Latonia, Illyria, Germania, in Transalpes, and in Aquitania; but these Boij were of the French race and dwelt at this time about the mouth of the Ruer of Lo.

Embassadors they slue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Country, & sent a Colony of their own to inhabit it. This caused the Boij, another people of Gaul, to feare the like measure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans ouerthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted vntill this end of the Illyrian war.

It vexed the Gauls, to see a Roman Colony planted in their Country; who had bin accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpes (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they were neerer; like as they called Cisalpes, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their dis-iunction had caused their losse, so their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the businessse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpes and Transalpes, fell together by the eares, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of war. Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignity, to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more should be caried thither, as would serue to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vnto those Gauls. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it self, would not ouer-ioy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger ioyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boij: who being Neighboursto Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolute, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchy of Milan, ioyned with the Boij, and vpon a common purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates hauing receiued a great Imprest, come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concolitanus and Aneroeslus: who with the Boij and Insubrians, compounded an Armie of fiftie thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer inuaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Senogalli, that had bin beaten out of their possessions, gaue a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeuing in their prosperitie & rising fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leaue a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: vwith the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Emilius to Rimini, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Asilius their other Consull, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscane.

Being at this time greatly troubled, vwith the consideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gauls had assembled, they caule a view to be taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: vwho were no lesse willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserue to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consulls they sent forth to the war foure Legions of their own: euery Legion consisting of fise thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; vwhich Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Embri and Sarfinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomanni, other twenty thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to inuade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the generall Armie of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all vncertaine chances of war, thirtie thousand foot, and fiftene hundred horse, garrisond in Rome it selfe, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Over and about the se great troups; in the Roll of the Latines; that was sent vnto the Senate, where were numbred foure score thousand foot, and fiftie thousand horse; in that of the Samnites, seuentie thousand foot, and of horse seuen thousand; in that of the Latins, & Volturnians, fiftie thousand foot, and sixtene thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Marsi, Marrucini, Ferentians, and the Vesuntians, of twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicily, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand foure hundred foot, & foure hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campanians ioynly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fiftie thousand foot; and of horse, three and twenty thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and about fixe thousand horse. Casting vp the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans & their Confederates, it amounted to fower hundred thousand foote, and seuentie thousand horse. But the number is somewhat misse-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himself by the dead paies: for where hee reckons nine hundred horse too many, hee fals short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

How great soeuer this Muster was, it seemes to haue been like vnto that, which Lodouick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth inuaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subiects, he tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes; within the Duchie, though indeed he were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Trasymene, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their slaues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrow at Canna. Wherefore the manuaile is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helms: though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Nowwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gauls keepe on their way: and entering into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome, hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscane, hauing taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had misse of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their iourney. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the same evening discouered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with stratagem: that shewed no great fineness of wit, but such, as well becomed those that had none other occupation than warre; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leauing their horse in guard; to vvhom they giue order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retrain, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their hasty departure, as the Gauls desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gauls returne, charge them; and kill fixe thousand vpon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of aduantage, and defend themselves, till L. Emilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the coming of the Consull, the Gauls consult, whether they should giue the Romans battaile, or forbear. In which dispute, Aneroeslus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to returne into their owne Countries; where, after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, pester, or other impediment. This aduice they all embrace; for seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wisdome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves, any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had both in fight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath been found extreme dangerous, to make a retrain in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaies going on from the pursuing enemy, they finde within a few miles, either streight, hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knowes

R. Iapyges, and Messapies seeme to be one Nation; who are also called Salernitani, Iapygians, & Calabrians: The Country is now Apulia, containing the Northernmost head-land of Calabria. In A people of the kingdom of Naples. Ptoleme calls them a people of Italy. A people of Campania, called to this day Fucutines, both Leanders.

e Cenomanni, are the people about Bergama, on the Northside of the Ruer Alp in Italy. There were also of these Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countrie of Main.

knowes it, as well as the Captaine; than he which forsakes the field; perceiues, and seares some aduantage of the Enemies. For which is the betrayer of these succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possessed the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and vnderstanding. They that make the reitrait, are alwayes in feare to be abandoned; they that lead the way, feare to be engaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, & perill, if those that sauaour the reitrait, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable ouerthrow that the French received in Naples, in the year 1503. vpon a reitrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth testify no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gaue the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot ouertooke, and defeated them vicerly. During the wars between the Imperials, & the French; Boiss and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a brauery would needs see the Enemy, before they left the field. So was Strofi ouerthrowne by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arriual. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (not finding themselves in case to giue battaile) haue done. Je ne trouue point (saith the Marshall Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une reitrait; I finde nothing in the art of warre so difficult, as to make a safe reitrait. A sure rule it is, that there is lesse dishonor to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noue giues this iudgement of a dayes reitrait, made in France, presently before the battaile at Moncontour. For (saith he) staying vpon our reputation, in shew, not to dislodge by night, we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disaduantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that vvorthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the reitrait at Moncontour with so great resolution, as he saued the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of vvhich my selfe was an eye-witnesse, and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turn their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Emilius followes them, as neer as he can, without engaging himselfe, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Confull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gaules, inclosed between two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear, and Front. To sustaine Emilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanois; in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gaules inhabiting vpon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules fell; and so did Atilius the Confull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Anerasius, with forty thousand of their Vassals. 1

After this fatall ouerthrow, the Gaules lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were inuaded the year following this ouerthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew vvell how to vse their victory: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirty yeares time, to the Gaules, to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Bois; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second year, Furius, & Flaminius, inuade the Milanois; and preuaile very far, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Venicians. Neuertheless these Consuls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, & compelled to resigne their Office: because the Augures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their diuination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not onely foreshewed little good, vvhen they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, & being otherwise aduertised of the contents, was not hasty to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Country; then persued the letters; & returning home obtained a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countrey of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that vnderstanding the Maiestic of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegation, or grand Commission; did not stand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vse their power, ouer himselfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, vvhich is proccesse of time grew the onely or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed, M. Caudius Marcellus, and C. C. Caracilius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that year. The Gaules about this time desired peace, and were like to haue obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it as fast as they vvould vvork. But when thirty thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britannicus, were come ouer the Alpes, & ioyned with the Insabrians; & other discourses, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Consuls halted: into their Prouince, where they beleaged Acerra, a town not farre from Nouaro (so far had the Romans pressed already) in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them from this siege, Britannicus far down before Clastidium, a towne in the same Tract, with great part of his force, leaving the rest, with the Insabrians, to attend vpon the Consuls at Acerra, and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vp their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and fixe hundred foot lightly armed; thought to deale vvell enough with those at Clastidium. Britannicus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to reiect themselves after their iourney, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britannicus had done vvell, if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauery, lost his game at a cast. He had aduantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so vvell of his own personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring, than the barbarous king: whether more vvise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to overcome him. He slue and slaine Britannicus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his Prouince tooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and last time, that ouer any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, vvith his owne hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph, whereof onely Romulus, Cosius, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipios, and diuers other Roman Captaines, especially Cesar, were better able to vvaite than any of these three, though they neuer offered vp to Iupiter, Opima spolia. The Armour of a Generall slaine by himselfe, vvhen they were Generals, nor perhaps afforded so to doe.

After this victory, Acerra was yielded to the Romans; & Milan soone after vvith all that belonged to the Cisalpinis, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many yeeres vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citie itselfe, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territories possessed by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italie; formerly as vvould not subiect their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-laners and Theues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeeres, following the peace made vvith Carthage. In part of vvhich time, they were at subleisure, to destroy vvhat they vvould of the Temple of Ianus: vvhich they neuer did before, (it standing alvvays open, vvhen they had any vvare) since once, in the reigne of Numa, nor in long time since vvith the reigne of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long: a vvild and warrey and perhaps the greatest that had ouer beeb, vvvas to come vvith their hands, vvhich being vvell leaded, they might boldly vvadertake, to extend their Monarchie, as their ambition could teach.

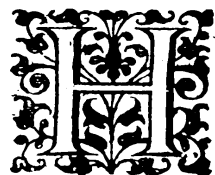

vvild and warrey and perhaps the greatest that had ouer beeb, vvvas to come vvith their hands, vvhich being vvell leaded, they might boldly vvadertake, to extend their Monarchie, as their ambition could teach. CHAP. 9.

CHAP. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

S. I.

The Warres of Hannibal in Spaine. Quarrells betwene the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilst the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. Warre proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

Hannibal, the sonne of Amilcar, was about fixe and twenty years old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. He was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barcha) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue beene lesse enuied, by these domestically enemies, if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in gouernment, and been the onely men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilcar, in sauing his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures and great reuenues; so was it retained by the same good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnreprovable, nor to performe the like seruices vnto the Common-weale, had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautious aduice of not prouoking the Romans. This they seasoned other-whiles with detraction, saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppresse the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious words were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparant, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no securitie to Carthage, were she neuer so quiet, and officious; vnlesse she would yeeld to become their Subiect. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could finde some good aduantage, to renew the vvarre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their owne state was in good case, the vvarre should begin; than that in some vnhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driuen to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to giue away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done, or miserably fight, vpon termes of disadvantage.

This disposition of his cuntrymen, Hannibal well vnderstood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuised of this businesse) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small aduantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistance, euery of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soeuer they would be, to hear that he had set the vvar on foot, would neuertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen, then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherofore, he resolved to lay siege vnto Saguntum, which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in minde the indignitie of that Spanish Towns alliance with their halfe friends. So should he assaie both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having

Having this concluded, he neuertheless went faine and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Lucius) to giue some colour to his proceedings; as if he had not principally intended the warre against Saguntum; but had beene drawne thither by course of businesse. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that (without regard of such formalities, it was needfull to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should prouoke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the Olcades, and hauing besieged Akthra (Lindocalleth it Carteia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master, not onely thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he first vnderooke, being subdued, and the winter at hand, he rested his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthage, and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the Spoiles he had gotten in his late conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the Vaccæi, and without any great difficultie, wan first Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, Arbucala, by assault though not without a long siege, and great difficultie. But in his returne, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all such of the Vaccæi, as were able to beare armes, being made desperate, by the spoile of their country, with those of Salamanca, and of the Olcades, that had escaped in the late overthrow, joining themselves with the Tolkians, compounded an Armie of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the bankes of the River Tagus, which runneth into the Sea by Lisborne in Portugale. These foure Nations, hauing had experience of Hannibals inuincible courage, and that he neuer saw enemy, vpon whom he durst not change; were thoroughly resolute, that his naturall valour would at this time be lesse neglect the cold aduise of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vse it. But he that makes himselfe a body of Chrysall, that all men may look through him, and discern all the parts of his disposition, makes himselfe (withall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drue him. Wise men, though they haue single hearts in all that is iust and vertuous, yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this Carthagean, when he serued vnder Asdrubal, was, of all the men of mark in that Armie, the most aduenturous. But that which may becoming a Captaine, or inferior Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath sometimes succeeded well with such great ones, as haue beene found more fortunate, than wise. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to dissemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with drew himselfe from the River side, as if fearefull to stand, thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their bankes of aduantage, the Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired, that they should thrust themselves in furie and disorder, into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defence of their contrary side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well nigh on, he turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing: and thrust his best men, both aboue and below them, like the River. These carrying a kind of lanze de puy, sharpe at both ends, which they held in the middle of the fluy, had such an aduantage ouer the foot, that were in the River, vnder their strokes, they came together, and vnable to stand, but flit their bodies, as on firme ground; that they (like those, in a manner) without resistance, which were already cheerd in the water, and pursued the rest, which like them were amazed, with so great a battell, they from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of the Saguntines excepted, that durst the least lift up their hands against the Carthaginians. The Saguntines perceiving the danger toward them, cryed before they were hurt, that they should send for succour, and besought themselves, as likely to suffer that, which they feared. But they suffered indeed, more by reason of their alliance and friendship with the Saguntines, than by reason of the Carthaginians. This late moued the Saguntines more a weapon, that Saguntum was already besieged. Hereupon some cryed, that Saguntum should be proclaimed by Land and Sea, as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Affrick. But others were more Roman-like to worke, and carried it. So it was onely concluded, that Embassadours should be sent into Spaine, to view the state of their Confederates, which were indeed none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would giue them ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him; if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they listed themselves, upon the report of these Embassadours, and this their gravity, in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours, Liue reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not received, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of sincerer lesse questionable, that they found him at Carthage, & had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Liue confesseth) & fall to disposition about the continuance of peace, if they had rejected that which was sent upon none other pretence, than pre-uention of warre.

While the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces; but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should doe as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Tuderitania Nation adioyning to Saguntum, & hauing many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbors) of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, he meddled with them, he made no more ado, but sat down with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been, of his owne Citizens; for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadours, with any trembling reuerence, as of late yers they had been wont. Neuerthelesse, he was glad of any hand, some colour, to shew his actions, not onely because the war, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrell, as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hasty to the combat, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, until they had an Army in readinesse to be sent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the scene of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Phrygius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them, either for that he found himselfe ouer-sightfully tyed up by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an untractable disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to haue defended and aided in all perils, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had assumed of their gifts. But he was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kind, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First he built ships, & spoiled the Isles of Greece, against the commands to which he was bound. Then he advanced further, & seized upon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had delayed somewhat longer, he might haue spied better. For the buisness with the Gauls, was ended with Hannibal, not throughly begun; when he declared himselfe by his doings, an enemy; and was thus quitted. The Senate of Rome, Scipio being against him, was in such a danger, that the strong Towne of Dimallum, and thereby through such a way upon the Romanes round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves, and to put him to death. And the Consul Pharus, in which Demetrius prepared to resist, which he might haue done long, if he had heeded Brutus had been too foolish, to resist at last, & a great part of his Army, in the Isle of Rhodus, by night, and before they were in order, putting himselfe the next morning with his ships before the Towne, and offering to surrender to him, & to promise with all his power, if he would, that the Consul, & was so much interested from the Towne, by that this day in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by paths to a chace, where he had shipping ready ready for him, and imbarqued himselfe: leauing all his estate vnto them, of whose liberty he first had it.

This buisness, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum, before which Hannibal sat downe, ere Scipio was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines, in one of which, their Generall received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many dayes vnable to move. Neuerthelesse he was not vnimindfull of his worke in the meane while, but gaue order to raise certaine mouable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the wals of the Citie, to add to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of diuers Towers, and a great length of wall, whereat an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not onely beaten from the breach, but out of some ground within the Towne, which upon the first furie they had won; that they were pursued euen to their owne trenches and campe. Neuerthelesse the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did for manye the townsmen with continuall trauaile, that at length it got within the wals, and was onely hindered from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the towne, to treat with Hannibal for some record. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuer, & without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound to his countymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had, gold, siluer, plate, and other riches within the citie: yea, the citie it selfe to be abandoned by the citizens, promising, that he would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, vnder which to sustaine themselves, than the cloathes on their backs; or other armes, to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better haue submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue inioyed their liues, and saved the honour of their wiues and daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did; by whom their viues and daughters were despoiled before their own faces, and all put to sword; that were about fourteen yers of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke, vhen not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the dearest rate, they shut themselves vp like most wretched creatures in their own houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying vreuenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the slaues, and other bootie, he diuided among his Souldiers, reseruing some things of choice, vnder which to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them in the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own slownesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight monthes, looking still for succour, but in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadours against Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as soone as they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their second Embassage, howsoeuer qualified with milde words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they onely required iustice against Hannibal, but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was vrged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, haue only followed his owne counsaile, or vvhether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeed worthy examination, or dispute, is, whether he were lawfull or unlawfull for Hannibal to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them: according to their faults and errors, to you, to challenge vs, if we haue done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Scipio the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made, for by your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treatie between vs and Lutatus, to your owne disadvantage, you cast it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise varrant; the same liberty may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cauill. For Lutatus the Consul, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better, to haue dealt plainly; and to haue alleadged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Ile of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: vvhich perurie the State of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge vvith open vvar. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie; and forthvvith inscribed their names into the Treatie of peace vvith Asdrubal: seeing that the Treatie vvith Asdrubal, and all other businessse between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman iniuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoeuer we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which we haue already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Lutatus himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar vvith desire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulnessse, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the vvar, now towards, had long been thought vpon, and like to be made vvith extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadors, to deliuer vnto them in plain termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, vvith which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies vvithin Iberus, those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had bene laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gowne-skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, vvich of them you like best, & purpose to imbrace. Hereat all cryed out: at once. Euen vvich of them you your selfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the assembly vvillingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make warre, it was merely friuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer bin maintained by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustie sword, and the empiric purse, doe alwaies plead performance of covenants. There haue been few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise vnderstood the obligation of a Treatie, than vvith the condition of their owne aduantage: and commonly (seeing peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing the best aduised haue rather begun vvith the sword, than vvith the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois vvith the French in Naples, Henry the second of France, vvith the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surpriue as many places as he could, eue the war brake but; Don Iohn vvith the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spaine, vvith the English, vvhen in the great Imbarge heooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of iniuries receiued from these enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire, that vvictoriously carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at vvhat time he did sacrifice being ready to take his iourney into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them vvith immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischiefe, as soone as he he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, vvhen his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no maruel, if the imprecation were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of these Kings, vvith vvhom we are now in peace, haue receiued the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spaine, and Africk. His iourney into Italy.

WArre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved, not to put vp his sword, vvich he had drawne against the Saguntines, vvntill he had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke Warre: second to none, that euer the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal vvintred at Carthage, vvhere he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the meane vvhile he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the gouernment of Spaine in his absence. He also tooke order, to send a great many troopes of Spaniards into Africke, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirtie thousand, eight hundred and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse, also eight hundred slingers of the * Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, all young men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; vvich he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that were vvayed most in their seuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. He also bestowed his brother to guard the coast and Ports, Asile and scien Gallies, vvhereof thirty seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans and other Nations strangers, he left vvith him about twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk, he sent Discouersers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenean Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Arme entire into Italy, and not bee compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and discouersers being returned vvith good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, hee passed ouer the River of Iberus, vvith an Arme consisting of foure thousand and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, vvich he had not entred before, hee now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old commander of his house, vvho late still at Carthage vvatched Spaine on the East side of Iberus, vvith vvhom hee left an Arme of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, vvithout asking pay; vvich that others might not also doe, or attempt, hee courteously dismissed many more, that seemed vvilling to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the iourney seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. Vvith the rest of his Arme, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, & one thousand horse, hee past the Pyrenes, & entred into Gauls. Hee found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrey: but vvithout vvith gentle speech, and rich presents that hee bestowed vpon their Leaders, to saue out his Expedition. So vvithout any molestation, hee came to the banks of Rhodanus, vvhere dwelt, on each side of the River, a people called Volci. These were vvacqued vvith the cause of his coming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But hee vvvas greatly assailed by some of these Gauls, vvich inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to vvith by those of Viuerz and Lionnois. For althoough many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrey of Daulphine, phine, thinking to defend the further bank against him: yet such as remained, being very desirous to see their Countrey of so many ill gutts, were better pleased to have their Countrey-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their owne store of corne and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boats, informed him of another more facile passage, higher vp the Riuer: and lent him guides. When the Vessels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse, he sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilear, vp the Riuer: himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was: that Hanno charging the Gaules vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further bank was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who maruellously feared the water. Hee was therefore driuen to make raffles of trees, and couer them with earth and Turfe, whereof he fastened one to each bank, that might serue as a bridge; to and from another of the same sort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Having past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defend it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpine, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himselfe extremely incombred by the Sauoians: and lost both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plaine Countrey on the other side. And whereas this journey ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trauaile, hee was every day, more or lesse, not only charged by those Mountaineers, but withall extremely beateen with grievous weather and snow: it being the beginning of Winter, when hee began, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plainnes, which were now ready to receive them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort and encouragement to go on: having nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made account to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armies, and resistance.

§ III

How the Romans in vaine solicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THe Countreys of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had bene solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, took Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to dissuade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly they received by one that spake for the rest, this uncomfortable answer: With what face (saith he) can ye Romans perswade vs to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, haue bene utterly rooted out, & destroyed by the Carthaginians, whom they might else haue held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Countreymen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesse at our hands; who are resolved, neuer to make account of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadors took their way towards the Gaules, vnder their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italy, through their Territorie: and withall greatly glorifying in themselves, in their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules taught them to scorne, and had hardly the patience, to heare them speake: For shall we (saide one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibal's passage into Italy, entertain a war which is doe meant to be made against vs? Shall we hold the warre among our selues, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans deferred so well of vs, & the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romans haue already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this vnpleasing answer the Embassadors returned home; carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Milissia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gaules gaue hastie proofe, for when the newes was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boij, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemed they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrey) to flee to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time, when the Gaules, hauing little skill in assaulting Cities, wearied, & seemed desirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage, marched in all haste to the reliefe of the besieged. But the Gaules, hauing laid a strong ambush in a wood lying to the way, fell vpon the Prætor so opportunely, as hee was utterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place, a few excepted, that recovered by fled running, a little village, but defensible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, G. Asilius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent; to relieue the besieged, with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consul's Armie, and supplied by a new leuie.

As the Gaules were too rash and hastic; so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this war: They were not perswaded, that Carthage, which had almost feruently endured so many indignities, in time of this late peace, would be so brisling and courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy in selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Italy, resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Acilius took his way towards Adria, with an hundred and sixty Quintunens, or Gallics; of such an oare, which population may seem to threaten euen the City of Carthage; to which he shall need no more add. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Prouence; and vied such diligence, hauing the minde of so famous a battle, as in five dayes he recovered Massilia: There he was aduertised, that Hannibal had his Army past the Rhodes of Medanus, whom he thought to haue found halfe yet a while in Spaine; and that he had also newes of the Consul's arrival; whereof he was not in the least, nor sorry, but rather willing to haue to doe with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discover the others numbers and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. The former and fought, and the Numidians were beaten; yet could not the Romans greatly stragge; haueing haue only two hundred, and three of their twine, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew neerer, to know what befell the Carthaginians, he found, that they were gone three dayes before, and that as he then found assuredly true, was an intricate look vpon the walls of Rome.

This

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spain. Neuerthelesse hee sent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Army, to trie what might be done against Asdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa, and so passing through Tuscane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troups of Mantius & Asilius that lately had bin beaten by the Gaules: with which forces hee made head against the enemy, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull iourney.

S. IIII.

Scipio the Romane Consul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Romane Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battell at Trebia.

FIVE Moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious iourney from Carthage; what great muster he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foote at an hundred thousand, & his horse at twentie thousand; others report them to haue beene onely twentie thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lavinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that ioyned with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when hee marched Eastward from the bankes of Rhodanus, he had with him eight & thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all saue those remembred by himselfe in the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue perished, by diseases, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaines; which mischiefs had deuoured, each, their severall shares.

* These dwell about Turine, a goodly City, now subject vnto the Duke of Sauoy: which from them tooke the name of Agusta Taurinorum.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countie of Piemont; he fought to win the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three daies. Their spoyle serued well to heauen his Armie, and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more adoe, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many also for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countie: which ioyned, or was all in readinesse to ioyne with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arriual, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had beene heard of his approach: many late still for very feare, who else would faine haue concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their seruice against the Carthaginians, whom neuerthelesse they had wished well to speed.

This wauering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals hasten to the trial of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondred at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange that the Consul whom hee had left behinde him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountaines; and the great spirit of his Armie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibal's successe, and sudden arriual. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste vnto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicilia, giving him to vnderstand hereof: & letting him further know, that whereas he had bin directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should turne the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speed, to saue Italy it selfe. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Lilybæum; with direction to land the Arminii at Ariminum, a Port Towne not farre from Rattenna: quite another way from Castrum, whither he was making haste. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so neere, that fight they must; & they could part aunder: Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Soldiers, by the best arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetoricke of a present example, that hee shewed vpon the prisoners of the Sauoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having beene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed, and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to bee deliuered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, til the one of them were slaine, with condition being the Victor, to receiue his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to vse in single combats. Euery one of these unhappy men wished, that his owne lot might speed; whereby it should at least bee his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and hauing none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoeuer vneuen termes, to ridde themselues out of slaueerie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them, wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but euen him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiuing what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grieuous) to liue in a perpetuall slaueerie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Riuers, the great distance from their owne Countreies, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. Hee therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case, seeing that there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer had bin broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrarie, hee told them that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, & in view of their owne Townes, who knew as many waies to saue themselues by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraime them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no means betwene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For, (saith a great Captaine of France) la commodité de la retraite aduance la fuite, The commoditie of a retreat, doth greatly aduance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that he had giuen order for the laying of a bridge ouer the Riuer of Ticinus, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had preuailed; and ouer how many Princes their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not onely so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeues, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (saide he) yet your selues may make iudgement what daring they haue now remaining, after so many troubles and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not onely beaten by ours, and driuen back to the very trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing out approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to disperse by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, people, both in Africa; and in Sicil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generall officers each being far advanced before the grosse of his Armie, with his Horse, and the Roman hauing also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground; and the enemies maintenance. When they discouered the approach one of the other: Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground between their troupes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to trie the mettrall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Darte, for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they receiued; as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consull vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardinesse deseruing his aide; and the haste flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he aduentured himselfe so farre; that he receiued a dangerous wound; and had bene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanius) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slave. Whilest the Romans were busied in helping their Consull; an vnexpected storme came driuing at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compass them about, whilest hee with his men at armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and routed: so that they all betooke them to their speed, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisdome, hauing lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extreamest of the tempest ouertooke him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, he in a manner stole the reitrait; and recouered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left sixe hundred of his Reare behinde him; who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein hee followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quandoq; dubium videatur, tutum miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort: If a Generall of an Armie, by some vnprosperous beginnings doubts the successe, or feele his Army fearefull or wavering; it is more profitable to seale a safe reitrait, than to abide the vn certaine event of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the Riuer; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and ealing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Campe, the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come; in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Antiochus, Antiochus, and Gessates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to help themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman Campe, wounded and slue many, especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate, with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruice. Hannibal receiued them exceeding courteously, and dismissed them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more use to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consull stole a reitrait, as he had done before; but not with the like ease and security. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him, and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had receiued a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their Campe, and thereby giuen time to all, save some few, in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the Riuer of Trebia, and saue themselves.

Scipio,

being unable to maintaine by reason of his wound, & wishall finding it expedient to abide the coming of his fellow-Consull, incamp himselfe strongly vpon the banks of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. Ready day, more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian side, among whom came in the day, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their own Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceiued better hope of recouering their downe men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Clastidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little money.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with desire of hastie reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse receiued, seeing that in manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hastied away Sempronius, that was newly arriued, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicil, awaited his coming. Hee therefore hastied thither; & from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being ioyned in one, the Consuls desired what that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiuing from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal was iouled; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the reitrait of the Gaules.

Sempronius, hauing receiued from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts, sought by all means to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. Hee also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-neere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary, obiecing the vnskillfulness of the new-come Souldiers: and wishall gaue him possession, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the Rivers of Trebia and Po, being already reuolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily haue auoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules, he much feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other: when being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same tittle, the Gaules inhabiting neere vnto Trebia, complained of iniuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that they might haue done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their safety, and to set them at libertie, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his owne Carver, and to take from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fled to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to ioyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this; hee suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed that it stood with the honor of Rome, to preserue their Confederates from suffering iniurie: and thereby might be wonne the friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent oute thousand horse: which coming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his foragers, and finding them heavy laden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest euen into their own Campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians sallie out against them: who came to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to backe his owne men; and called the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawn forth; and a battaile readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginians had not reuolted.

The victory for to the Consull would haue it called, made the Romans in general desire.

desirous to trie the maine chance in open field: all the persuasions of his friends notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduised by the Gaules, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he be thought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: hee found in the hollow of a water-courfe, ouer-grown with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambush. There in he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their campe, hee led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, hee had sent ouer Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse; to braue the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take his opportunity to fight: and therefore not onely issued out of his Campe, but forced the Riuer of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armies they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one, sixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse: thrusting their light-armed, and Dartes, in loose troupes in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies; in horse, they had by far the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their foot were charged both in front and flank, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants, when finally the whole Armie was vnawares prest in the Reare, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies sword, and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of sixe and thirty thousand; than one thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which euery one deserued to be recompensed with the losse that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferior in horse, and withall thereby subiect to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-cuen grounds and wood-lands, would haue been of no vse. His second error was, that he made no discouerie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was grossely ouer-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drencht his footmen with emptie stomackes, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a most cold and frostie day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well; There is nothing more inconuenient and pernicious, than to present an Armie tyred with trauaile, to an enemy fresh and fed; for as the strength of body faileth, the generosities of minde is but as an vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got there with into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceiued him not, because of the showres, or would not persecute him, because they were ouer-weared. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger, flying through the Countie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Neuertheless hee got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

S. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gaules into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul saile, and his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymene.

The Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vast for seruice to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keep the same, they warme in Placentia, and Cercinona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to be very quiet; but vexed them with continuall Alarmes, assailing diuers places, and taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Lygurians to his side, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Roman Consuls, Treasurers, Treasurers, two Colonels and five Gentlemen the Sonnes of Schatoours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in Arretium places, loaden with yrons, and miserably fedde: these of their followers he not onely well intreated; but sent them to their Countries without ransome, with this protestation, That he therefore vndertooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countie the seat of Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieued than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others adomished him of the danger; and these that gaue him the aduise, were ready soone after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that he might not be descied, nor knowne, to those that should vndertake to make him away. Faine he would haue passed the Appenines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gaules, till he had seene more Swallowes than one. At length, when the yeere was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre nearer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Lygurians and Gaules; more seruiceable friends abroad, than in their owne Countie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountains was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way; the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when he was travelling through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter that makes all waies foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iourne. Neither lesse to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance & fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue been erected vpon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, saue one; together with the vse of one of his eyes, by the moystnesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deep mire and water. In briefe, after he had with much adoe recovered the firm and fertile Plains, he lodged about Arretium; where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman Consuls.

Flaminius, & Cn. Seruilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this yeere: Seruilius, a tractable man, & wholly governed by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator; who hauing once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be serued so againe, vnlesse he quickly finished the warre. This ialous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entered into his Office, lest his aduersaries, by fayning some religious impediment, should detain him within the Citie, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that he hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, reuoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their intunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman, hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilius came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countie between Fesula & Arretium he put to fire and sword, euen vnder the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true, that a great Captain of France hath said; Pas gaste n'est pas perdu; A wasted Countie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many aduised him (which had indeed been best) to haue patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare, saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilest the Carthaginians were burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he took horse, and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stucke so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a least; saying, That the cowardly knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) hauing hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weake to lift it: asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their ielousie, both hee and the Senate that did giue him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire, which whilst the Consul thought to quench with his enemies blood, hee pursued Hannibal so vnadvisedly, that hee fell with his whole Armie into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betwene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was hee charged vnawares, on all sides, (saue onely where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flye from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was hee slaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thousand dead carcases of his Countrey-men. About sixe thousand of his men, that had the Vantguard, tooke courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way recovered the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by necessity, had wrought the effects of hardinesse; was well asswaged, when they ceased to despair, of sauing their liues by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweat, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noise, but not any way discouering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noone, the ayre was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellowes. But they staid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were discried, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should haue thought vpon sooner, since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For descried they were, and Maharbal sent after them, who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendering vp their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, That it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they listed, if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargain; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present aduantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal be as a Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidioufnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it loseth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which all that were not Romans, he set free without ransome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans he kept in straight prison, and in fetters; making them learne to eat hard meate. This was a good way, to breed in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the generall safetie, but onely the preserving of her owne neck from the yoke of slauey, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two batailles. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the bataille of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Serullius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but coming too late, hee increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this

companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Serullius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gauls, against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular ielousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errors, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to be caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to bee preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honor of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrarie to all good aduice, haue beene so hasty to fight, before the arriual of Serullius. If Sempronius had beene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly auow it, that by being continued in his gouernment of France ten yeeres, Cesar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Heluetians and many of the Germans, vnder the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene euery yeere a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, haue beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions of the Places, Riuers, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wise as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Government, fitting the Countrey, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great preiudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer beene the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their slothfull ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

S. VI.

Now Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingering warre. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successfull attempting; adventures rashly vpon Hannibal, and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

Greatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparant; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than euer did was, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receive an ouerthrow, that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee onely sought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himselfe like a couragious enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name, against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bin out of vse; and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subiect vnto contrall of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but vpon some extremeitie, and sat no longer time than sixe moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood vpon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too sick off, the People took upon them, changing supreme authority, to give the Dictator by their election; to Quintus Fabius, the best reputed man of warre in the City. Novum facimus, novum consilium expellimus, trarie vias, contrarie courses. Quintus Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the Horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion bene also good. But if it were true (as Livy reports it) that the Bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this business of devotion; then must we beleue, that those books of Sybil, preserved in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified, as having not bin rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeded alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons returne alieue from Thrasymene, may serue to beare witness; though it be more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuer were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cin. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome and Ostia, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Fourte Legions he had leuied in haste: and from Ariminum he receiued the Armie, which Seruius the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forth with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrey, and vsed all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to beare arms. Passing by Spoletum & Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauailed Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that he had gotten. Having refreshed his Army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Souldiers, & (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasterns in old wine: hee followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Province of the Kingdome of Naples, spoiling the Marriages, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he p[er]u[er]sed, hee had not taken any one City: only he had assailed Spoletum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poitiers, a little before the battaile of Moncouter, and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S. Iuan d'Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprise, & should detain him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as hee saw him; and prouoked him with all manner of bravado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betwix the Souldiers bred vnder discipline, since they were Boyes, in warre and in blood, trayned and hardened in Spain, made proud and honourous by many victories there, & of late by some notable blouds against the Romans; and such, as had no former seen this enemy, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so neere, as hee kept him from doing any thing more; and presented the countrey round vnder spoyle. He injured his men by tithes, and livery, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees, and he brought them first to take on the Lyon a faire off, that in the end they might sit on his taile. Majorem ad nosq[ue] hostem adhibuit.

Now

Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxlog Fabius with cowardise and feare. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For while men are no more moued with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It waiteth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the inuading Armie that desires battaile; and this of Hannibal, was both the inuading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apennines, and to fall vpon the most rich & pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to aduocate the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weake in horse, he alwaies kept the Hills & fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, & that the Towns stood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in sight, though a farre off; he resolved to rest his Armie, that was laden with spoyle, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the hills of Callicula, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly Garden-countrey, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of prouision for his wintering. It was by mere error of his guide, that he first entred vwithin these streights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Casilinum, vvhence he might both assay the false citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vnder hand, & hinder the Romans from coming neer it to prevent him. But his guide mis-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronounciation, and conducted him awry another vway, from Casilinum to Casilium, vvhence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, & won the victory, without blowes. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a slight inuention, yet seruing the turne as well as a better. In drining the countrey, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, vvhose homes he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driuen vp the hills. The spectacle vvas strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be a worke of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept vwith in his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, vvhhen some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs, & fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his vvhole Armie, reconered sure ground without molestation: vvhence he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his iourney towards Rome: & the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner, keeping still on high grounds, betwix him and the Citie, whilst the Carthaginian wasted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped vnder the broken wall. Other matters of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some business of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius, the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion, to shew his owne sufficiency. He was fully persuaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans & Spaniards, by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to prevent. All the Armie was of his opinion, and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by indgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this folly of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden so to do by the Dictator, the breach of whose command was extreme perillous. But the honour of the victory, which he held vndoubtedly his owne, and the loss of the Armie, and the friends that he had at home, bearing off in Rome, were enough to saue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer to haue murthered. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more dangerous gameller. Therefore he drew neere, & to prouoke the Romans, sent forth his third part of his Armie to waste the Countrey. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wan it from them the next day; and intrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not onely for his men but for his horses, which he knew to be the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could giue to the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, incourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrey at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruest. This aduantage Minutius wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order, presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, he sent abroad against the forragers, who being disperfed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Roman took heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceiued that it was meere weaknesse, which held him within his campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This imboldned Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuertheless he did not such hurt, as he had receiued.

For this piece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, vvith somwhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recouered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his own campe; & that in so doing, it came off vvith the better. Euery man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: sauing that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so ioyfull of a little good lucke, as angry vvith the breach of discipline, and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise, and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euery one cried out, especially Metellus a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he list, vvithout feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our onely Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to be wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consull all this while; Seruilus is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and He, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborne to spoyle some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuie and suspicion) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoyle all others, vvithout impeachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sole Governement both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authority, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But lest, in mouing the people herto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie, thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will onely onely propound, That the Master of the Horse may be ioyned in equall authority vvith the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, vvere ill perswaded of the course vvich Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so iniurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publique, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit & authority, besides the propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that dignity, whose great power, had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had bene Praetor, vv as glad of such an opportunity, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow vv as the sonne of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very basenesse. And now he thought the time was come, for him to giue a hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, vvich none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hor inuectiue, not onely against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, That it grieued them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Governement; That they sought to humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impouerish them by vv arre; especially by warre at their owne doores, vvich would soone consume euery poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise: and since they had found one, (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deserts, and giue him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceed as he had begun. So the Act passed. Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consull, vvich was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius: and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiuing well, that he should not be able to vvithstand the multitude, in hindering the Decree. The news of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colledge, began to treat vvith him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in vvhat sort he thought it best to diuide their authority: vvether that one, one day, and the other, the next; or each of them successiuelly, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should neuer be his superiour: Hee would therefore diuide the Legions vvith him, by lor, according to the custome: Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that vvith halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplishe. Neuertheless he meant to doe his best, and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Linie seemes to taxe him for it) that he should so doe: For vvhere two seuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto another, nor ioyned in Commission, but haue each intire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in vvich regard, one Campe shall not hold them both, vvithout great inconuenience. Polybius neither findes fault vvith this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was vvilling to command in chiefe successiuelly (as the two Consuls vvied) vvith Minutius; by turnes. He saith that Minutius was very refractary; and so proud of his aduancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: vvho theretvpon referred it to his choyce, either to diuide the forces between them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subiection, vvhen once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authority, loue nothing more, than to contest vvith it: as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good this opinion which had thus aduanced him, Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Country lying between them was open and bare; yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adioyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse; and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouered. But lest by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer, betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to business little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion; which not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to adventure vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he gouerned, he sent forth his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troups with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves, losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiving a farre off, into what extreimty his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe and his followers, did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approue himself by hastning to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to seele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired: fearing to be well warded with a shewre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops; Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Pabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to haue been saved. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly as the Dictator would haue it; both whilst his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Scruilius the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neerer within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed ouer into Africke; and there negligently falling to spoyle the Countrey, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consul, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

§. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, chosse a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces leuied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Canne. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

WITH little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, hear the great commendations that were given to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiuing a great overthrow: but he had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honourable to doe iust nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready euery man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his own priuate losse, vpon the ill administration of the publike.

This affection of the people, was very helpfull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commiseric was then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Whereiaro helpe, he had a kinsman, Dubius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to give the liberty of his place; in saying what hee listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen. That Mini- tius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to haue bene ouerthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had all bene ioynd together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when hee commanded ouer all as Master of the horse; that without a Plebeian Consull, the warre would neuer bee brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians, as had long since bene aduanced to ho-nous of the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner sort, euer since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needfull to chosse a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian;

 a more new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could wisht more, than to keepe it, by well deserving of them. By such persuasions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detaching from their ho-nous; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People to sell out, or at least was alleadged, that neither of the two present Consuls could be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a third was named for that purpose: and he againe depolled; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Consuls. This inter- regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this: All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the time were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successiuely the space of five dayes, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Patres, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited onely vpon the chiefe of them with these Enignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consulship; and put in vse, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeere following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed not more, than to slip five dayes, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well alluaged. Vpon such change of those that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners; to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publicly declare themselves to seeke those Offices. But no device would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was beleeued) of this meane, but worthy man, seemed so manifest; that when the People had vnged the businesse to dispatch, onely Terentius was chosen Consull: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary make had stood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiencie, and reputation, should be ioynd with him, as both Common and opposite. So L. Aemilius Paulus, he, who few yeeres since had ouer-come the Kings; and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was urged by the Nobility for the place: which he easily obtained, having no Competitor: it was not the part of this honorable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great business of the state, or wealth. For notwithstanding his late good seruice, and M. Licinius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards iniuriously vexed by the People, and came vnto judgement; wherein Licinius was condemned, and Aemilius hardly escaped; by of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in minde, each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably appaie their worth, like one of them nobly dying, in the most glorious losse; the other braving winning, in the most happy victory.
 These new Consuls, Terentius and Pabius, ouer-ruled the Peoples deligence in preparing the warre; wherein though Terentius made the greater noise, by saying what wonders he

he would worke, and that he would aske no more, than once to haue a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the providence and care of Senatus, traualled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Servilius and Mutius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheless, to plic the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised, is vncertaine. Fourescore thousand foot, at the least, and sixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Here, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieued the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other provisions. Nothing more, than that one of these two mightie Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing them soe, what euently ballanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa, (perhaps) by that meanes they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and counsaile were louingly accepted; and instructions were given to Timon of Sicily, that he should waite for the Carthaginians, which was to goe into Sicily, that he should accordingly passe over into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more seru to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were notedly drawne into the field, and fitted for seruice. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twentie five thousand, with L. Postumius Albinus another of the Prators, went against the Gaules, to recleatne that Prouince, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip the son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing beene their subiect, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they receiued, it is not knowne: onely this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth began to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven soone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soeuer) would haue beene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any ciuill about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as possibly they could, without incurring the necessity of a battaile. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their successe for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not onely blemished the honour of their other seruices, but was indeede the occasion, to draw on the misery following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him, lodged about Cannus; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aside for all necessities, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Cannus: for the rowne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not onely furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vntill they would be troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrey, fit for the seruice of his horse: longer than the Romans, hauing so many murtherers to feed, could well endure to tarry, without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them vnderstand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would serue him to command the most part of the Countrey adiacont; it then seemed needfull, to send vnto the Fathers themselves, to aduise a battaile with the Carthaginians, rather than suffer him, thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Neuertheless, answer was returned vnto Servilius, that hee should haue patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as need required.

When all things were ready in the Citie, and the season of the yeere, commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their Armie, set forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great solemnities: especially, whensoever they went forth to warre against any noble orredoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vowes, were made vnto Jupiter, and the rest of theingods, for good successe and victorie: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, (not onely such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Volunaries, for loue; but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leaue taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Emilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought, either worthy of this honour, or likely to doe his countrie remarkable seruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no lesse in greatnesse, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Paulus the late Dictator, is said to haue exhorted the Consull Paulus, with many good words, to shew his magnanimitie, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in braying the outrageous follie of his fellow Consull. The answer of Paulus, was, That he meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his Countrey: but if he saw his best were likely to be still taken, he would thinke it lesse rashnesse to aduenture vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diffinition betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was vpon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Cannus.

These new Generals, arriuing at the Campe, dismissed M. Atilius one of the last yeeres Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weaknesse; Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. He willed them to consider, not onely now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their owne great numbers: which were no lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrey stood; how the state and safetie thereof, rested vpon their hands; vsing some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of his Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour: but that onely by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia & Thrasymene. Hertwithall he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill hee was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darknesse, whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helpes, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Emilius was knowne to bee, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came short of them in all things else, saue craft; which would not alwayes chruce. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire, that they should haue heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, hauing preconceiued a victorie, thought all delays to bee impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselves of their best helpe, which was,

was good conduct. They remembered what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Emilius had acknowledged, that the aduantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Confull Terentius; who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than hee had beene in the Citie. Expectation is alwayes tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie; to bee freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

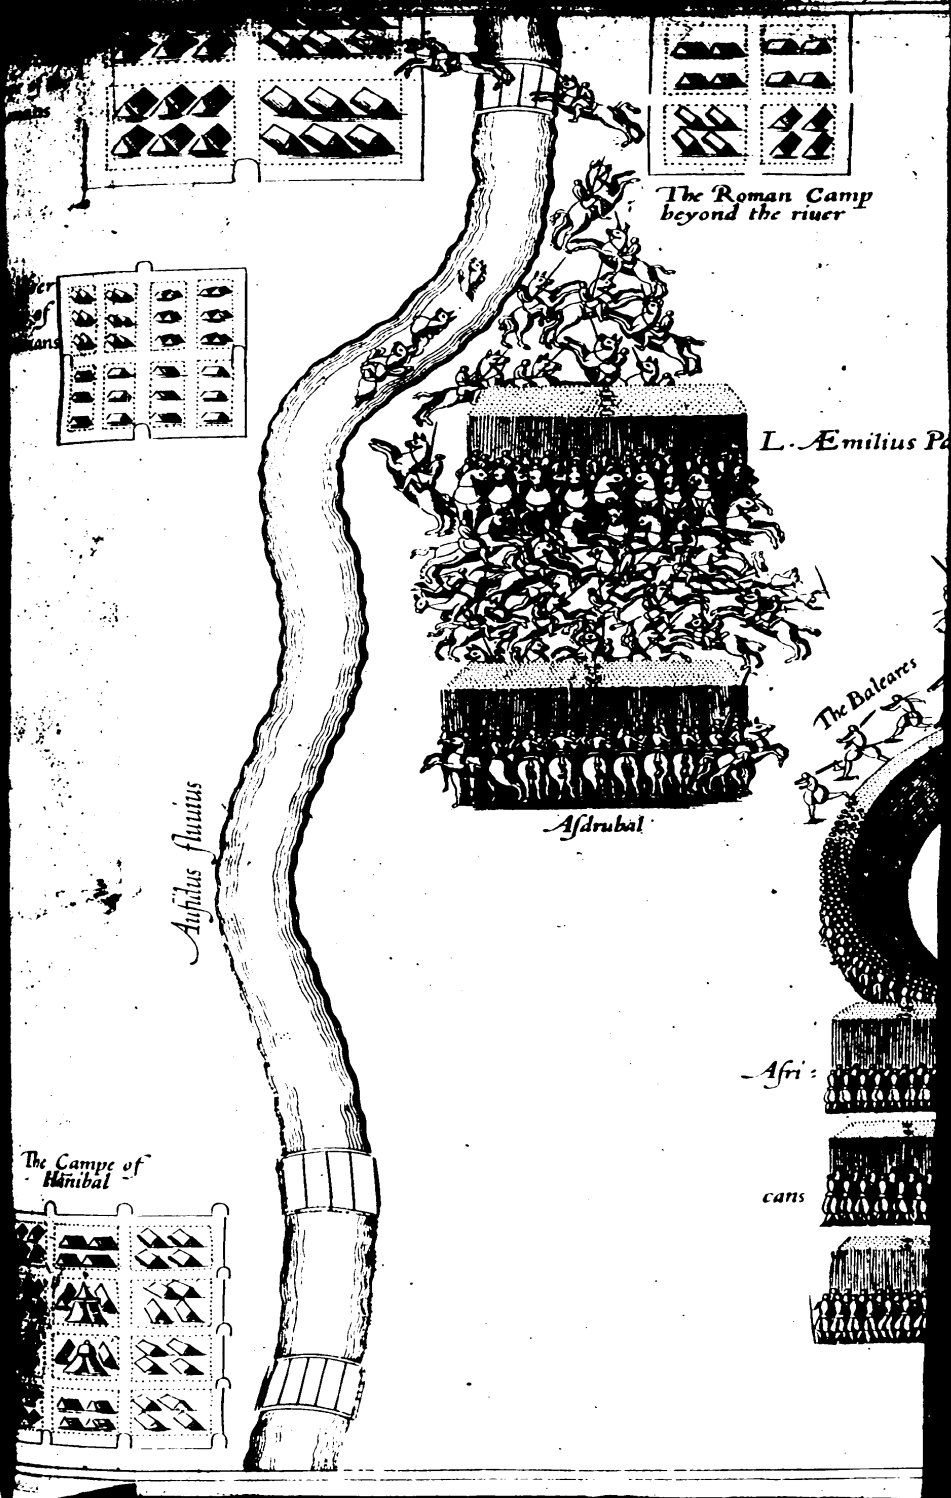

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconuenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Emilius would so too; but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remoue hence, into places losse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeres provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Haruest? This would (said Varro) fauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their words: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably every day. Emilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vncuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come, hee doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leaue running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless he fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude wel-come and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell vpon the Roman Vantcoursers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilest it was yet in march: but they were beaten off; not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Emilius, who could not handsomely withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus, sending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lye vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselves. Hee neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground serued wholly for the aduantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equall tearmes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remoue towards Gerion, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Armie foraging the Countrey, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

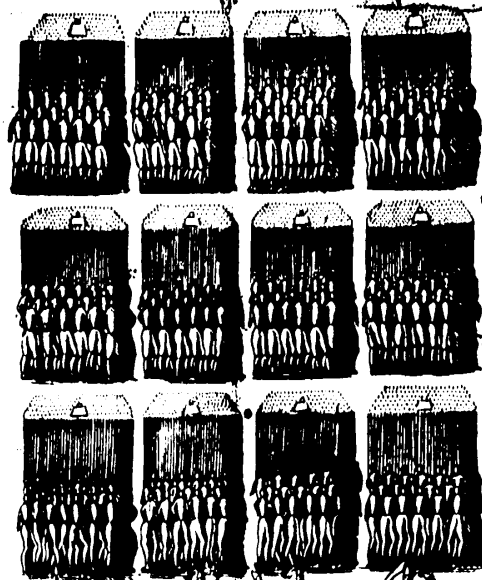

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Linie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had beene driuen; and of base courses that he deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a litle longer. Hee had (saith Linie) but tenne dayes prouision of meat. He had not money to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruely Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lack of all other counsaile, he resolved to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithful Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early haruest. But whilest he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him to that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaine ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Linie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused, as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith; Hannibal de fugâ in Galliam (dicitur) agisse: Hannibal (is said) to

haue brought himselfe of flying into Gaule: where hee makes it no lesse than a matter of heere-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the possession of Solfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaule, through the Marais and Bogs of Hennria, could finde victuals enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yere; especially seeing he had plaid the careful husband in making a great haruest, since he had long beene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Roman provisions? Suteable herunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corrie and cattell; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into murinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his stocke, since he came into that Countrey, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and laden his followers with spoyle: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not ealie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Army free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might hee so doe, hauing not onely pronounced, That which of his men soeuer fought brauely with an Enemy, was therby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested & sworn, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a senselesse deuice. Hannibal, being there with his whole Army, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrey and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now doe there with his horse, or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to liue; hauing betrayed all his Armie; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth, who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Linie. But of this and the like it is enough to say; That all Historians loue to extoll their own Countrey-men; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honor of the victory taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blinde Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgouernment of their own forces: as if they might easily haue won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vse his owne authoritie; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of the day he began to passe the Riuer, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and fought, as in former times, to haue dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrey to a needlesse hazard. Against whose words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could allege none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to assaile: must this also be suffered? Hee would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Emilius perceived; that hee could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion, hee tooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leaue behinde him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucitie he was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight began, & taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done, the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesser Campe; whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground fingers of the Balcares: Asdrubal was upon the main flank, and was ready to countred; nor after the manner of horse on horse, but on horse back, with the most about Amil: but Asdrubal being on the right hand, could not be hindered the River on the one hand, and the number of the foot on the other hand, so that was no way left, but a great retreat, and a great slaughter: they not only lost their Lances and Swords; but rolling violently among the Enemies, grasped one another and so, their horses running from under them, many fell to the ground; where falling again, they began to be slain by blows like to men in a battle: the Roman horse utter-borne, and driven by plain force to the great confusion: This the Consul Paulus could not resist: For Asdrubal, with his Boisterous Gauls and Spaniards, was resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, unequal both in number, and in When the Battails came to fighting, the Roman Battails found work enough somewhat more than enough, to break that great Crescent: upon which they so strongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spaniards make resistance, that the two points of their Battails drew towards the midst: by whose sides the sides were forced to disband, and flye backe to their first place: This they did haste and feare: and were with no less haste, and folly pursued upon the stood behind them, they needed not call for aid: both for Asdrubal there was room enough; and forasmuch as the Reare, or Flankes of this Moore, pointed the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this happy retreat, of night, of the Gauls and Spaniards it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limbe or vnter comle of the halfe Moore, made the innermost or conuest surface thereof disordered and though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes of point thereof, as yet, untouched, only turning round, & revolving very little. So the Romans in pursuing them, were fastened in an halfe circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken, and the become of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But while the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on upon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselves deeply in the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so far, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they encloset them, in a manner, behind and forward they could not passe farre, without removing Hannibal and Asdrubal; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparant, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now: For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaued themselves, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would haue beene so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Capitaines: but since the Consull Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consull Paulus, followed vpon them along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consull himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, of willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuerthelesse he cheered vp his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne stout behaviour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaille, and with better success. For the Consul receiued a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme, yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weaknesse, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his delighted, thinking that the Consul had given order so to doe: as in many battles when men at armes had left their harnes, to help their foot in distress. When he for the time next at hand perceived this, and understood that the Consul had given order so to doe, he was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had received this intelligence from the Consul, that he had given order so to doe: meaning, that he had them bound as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with his confederates, lighted left wing, was marvellously troubled by Hanno (or *M.

 the Numidian*) who beating vp and downe about that great sandy Plaine, about which was a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomedly, draue in and out many of the Romans. These, vsing their aduantage both of number and of the wind, with the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at last they seemed to promise him a happy day of it. For when the battrailes were broken, the hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, which they had behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which were) throwing downe their armes, rendred themselves. This was good lucke for the Romans, had been good meaning: Varro had not leisure to examine them, but was forced to followe them, to get them behinde the Army and to let them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty aduencurers did as he did, for a while, till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had yielded. Under their jackets they had short swords and poyards, which they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slain, which they threw vpon the handmost of the Romans, whilst all eyes and thoughts were another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terror in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the backs of the Romans. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was giuen by the Numidians. Asdrubal hauing in short space broken the Roman troups of and put in pieces all, save the Companie of Emilius that rushed into the grosse of and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage between the Roman and Browne Battalions, did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but turned the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians:
 he ioyned, and gaue vpon Terentius. The Numidians, seeing this, gathered a great cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behind the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme vnto those vpon whose side it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to do, thought it the best way, to auoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was wiser than they, in apprehending the greatnelle of his own perill, nor more in struing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shrank from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue indured with their aid. Now he found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another to encounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his pro-posall would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fit for that seruice. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassed them, fell vpon the backs of the Romans, that were ere this hardly distressed, in manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily, vvhich before made them valiant, being inclosed, and laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne, and a pittifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, not whither or which way, whilst euery one sought to auoid those enemies, that were nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got vp and saved themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could do, will rather beleue it, than suppose that Linus so reporteth, to grace thereby his tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, saw the Consul sitting all bloodied vpon a stone, intreated him to rise and save himselfe, offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to save himselfe, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to bee brought to this judgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty himselfe.

*selfe of that dayes losse. Further, he willed Lentulus to comfort him up the Sciron, and to particular to Fabius: willing them to forsake Rome, as fast as well they could; and telling Fabius that he lined and doted himselfe of his whole soul: counsaile. These words moved uenture) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when againe he will he was drawne to that Battaille, or when he beheld the first defeat of his country what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Lentulus knew vvhether he said a good while before this, when he thought the Consul & his troops in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans was inclosed indeed as within a sacke; whereas the African Battalions made the sacke, the Spaniards, Gaules, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians in the bottome, and Asdrubal with his horse, closed vp the mouth: in vvhich part, they first of all were thrust together, and beganne the Rout, vvherein all the rest followed. Emilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilest the battaille yet lasted, and whilest the spaces were so wide open, by which he might haue withdrawn himselfe, was now (had he neuer so well be-mounted) vnable to flie, hauing in his vvvay so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell aspace in that great Carnage. It is not vnto his honour, That in the Battaille he fought no lesse valiantly, than he had way before, both abtaind himselfe, and dissuaded his fellow-Consull, from fighting any more; when the day was vtterly lost, it had lien in his power to saue his own life, vnto the end of his country, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much esteemed himselfe, or being too faintly minded, was vvvieie of the World, and so thankfull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Emilius, as depending out of Roman valor, then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot, when Lisle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsbury, vvho died in the Battaille of Castillon, more highly to be honoured. For Emilius was old, grievously, if not mortally, wounded, & accomptable for the ouerthrow receiued: Talbot was in the flower of his youth, unhurt, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaille, and desiring to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone and leaue him.*

be gone and leaue him. In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, who as Linie saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about sixe hundred of them brake forth, and ioyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselues away ere morning, about four thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in vvhole troups, partly disperfed, into Cannusium: the next day, the Roman camps, both lesse and greater, were yeilded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them: Polybius hath no mention of this escape: onely he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Æmilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed, but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-nere done, the battaile was lost: and Hannibal, comming ouer the vvater to them, draue them into their own campe; vvhich they quickly yeilded, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his vvictorious Armie, a greater number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vvain, retired into their campe, and held the enimie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whose fault or fortune vvvas like) that hauing serued at Cannæ, vv ere afterwards extreamely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine: but very few they vv ere that saued themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the Riuer; and Terenus the Consul recovered Venusia, with three score and ten at the most in his companie. That he was so ill attended, it is no maruell: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his needfull vvay thither, had been through the midst of Hannibals Armie, if the passage had bene open. Therefore it must needs be, that vvhen once he got out of fight, he turned vp some by-way, so disappointing the Numidians that hunted courses. Of such as could not hold pace vvith the Consul, but tooke other vv aies, and were scattered ouer the fields, two thousand, or thereabout, vv ere gathered vp by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest vv ere slaine, all saue three hundred; who disperfed themselves in flight, at Cannæ led and got into sundry Townes. There died in this great Battaille of Cannæ, Terentius Fabius the Consul, two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, one hundred Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourescore Senators, or such as had office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were all made, as hauing been Ædiles, Prætors, or Consuls: among whom was Cornelius the last years Consul, and Minutius, late master of the horse. The number of men taken in this battaille, Livius makes no greater than three thousand foot, and hundred horse: too few to haue defended for the space of one halfe houre, both in Camps, which yet the same Livius saith, to haue bin ouer-cowardly yielded may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the Storion shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they losse than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were as the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yielded in the greater campe, when their comrades were either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls outright: which the Romans, by the Consul Varro, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host, nothing credible, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thousand, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not sensible, in the ioy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as he aduised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome, it is little doubted, the Warre had presently been at an end. But he beleued not so farre in his prosperity, and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use, a

6. IX.

Of things following the battaille at Cannæ.

Dr without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their trauailes, than the truth of the information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all their proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, as conscript. No man of sound iudgement will condemne this liberty of censuring which Polybius hath vsed. For, to recompence his iniurie (such as it was) he produced substantiall arguments, to iustifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanity of former Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: and it is to be suspected, that he would not haue taken, had he been borne in these two Cities, but haue spared some part of his diligence, and been contented to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserved, of his owne Relation. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and it is some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that the works of ther opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. This cannot be, we must be sometimes bold, to obserue the coherence of the Relation, and beleue so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) probability. This attentiu circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the negligence, or forgetfulnesse, which we find in the best Narration, of things following the battaille of Cannæ. For it is said, that foure thousand foot & horse gathered together at the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got into the city of Canusium, choosing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Sp. Claudius; yet that the Consul Terentius Varro, ioyning his company vnto those of Scipio at Canusium, brought them to the Senate, that he had now well-neere ten thousand men about him; that the rest of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, and been taking order for pacifying those tumults in the City, which grew vpon the fruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadors from Capua (after some time) whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumstance, to side with the Romans, were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretty while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-took (in a manner) at Rome the first news of the ouerthrow ouertrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutuell dependence in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman camp, and trussed vp the spoiles, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman partie, & make alliance with Carthage. The first towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Cossa, where he laid vp his baggage: & leaving his brother Mago to take in other places, He hasted into Campania. The general affection of the multitude, in all the cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not onely in regard of their grievous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves; who could not hinder him from spoyling the countrey, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly indure; but in a louing respect vnto that great countie (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victory at Cannæ, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had sought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their loue by gifts; pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all waies & means, to make them his, whilst all other motiues were concurrent. At this time also he began to deale kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate, but being prouoked by iniuries, sought to right himselfe and his countrey; & fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule, not which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransom: and together with these, he sent Carthala a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feele the disposition of the Senate, whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersity, and could stoop vnto desire of peace. But with the Romanes these arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all, or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not onely wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, & not vntill the former generation vicerly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the State of Rome, and by many mutuell affinities therewith as streightly conioyned, as were any saue the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred, without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not, (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the citie of Capua, answerable vnto the country, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauery is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like layes by their feathers, despised the vntfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the Maiestie of Rome, and could not indure to heare of Innouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was gouerned by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacurnius Calaninus an ambitious Nobleman, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the coniunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their city to the Carthaginians shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourney into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the neer nesse of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindered them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, & free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate, which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him him of all faithfull meaning, were driven to sit still in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discouered themselves, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more intensed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their own cowardize. The people holding so tender a regard of liberty, that even the lawfull Gouernment of Magistrates grieued them; with an imaginary oppression, had now good cause to feare, lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, & by helpe of the Romans bring them vnder a more streight subiection, than euer they had indured. This feare being ready to breake into some outrage, Pacurnius made vse of, to serue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sat in Council, about these motions troubling the citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, & after to ioyne themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and saue them harmelesse. This he spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People, and priuy vnto their designs. Hauing thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promised neuerthelesse to deliuer them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leaue, He called the people to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to heare, he told them, that these wicked Gouernours were surprisid by his policie, & all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Onely thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearsing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their iudgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Choose then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, vnprovided for such an election, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were vtterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, basenesse, and insufficiency, or else euen because they were vknown, and therefore held vnworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen, (the fittest men to be substituted, hauing been named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacurnius intreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtlesse) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacurnius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for sauing all their liues. Neither did the Senate faile after this by all obsequiousnes, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Wil, who else were likely to cast them down: All the city being thus of one mind; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Cannæ, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouths to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principal gentlemen of the Campans, did then serue the Romans in the Ile of Sicill: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadors were sent vnto Terentius the Consul, to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wherefoeuer they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the seruice of their State, and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: saying, that all was lost, and that the Campans must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to haue added a foolish Inuectiue against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcases, & to feed vpon mans flesh; with such other stuffe, as only bewraied his own feare. As for the Campans themselves; He

He put them in minde of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, with monie, and all prouisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came, & filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; vvhceras before, they were somewhat timorous, in aduenturing to seek their owne libertie. Having reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, vvvith vvhom they easily made alliance, vpon these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Lawes; That no Citizens of theirs should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in vvhat case soeuer, whether in War or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Romane prisoners, such as themselves would chooseth, vvhom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which vvcre in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen, opposed himselfe earnestly: vsing, in vaine, many perswasions, to the wilful, and head-strong Multitude; vvhom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarantines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors vnto Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the towne: at which time hee gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, vvhom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleging, that he vvvas, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; & therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples, vvch he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the wals too high, & was not well provided to lay siege vnto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnity and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the towne, to behold that great Commander, vvch had won so many noble victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed over his first Entertainments, He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke, promising, that ere long all Italie & Rome it selfe, should be driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receiue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a traitor to the State: & vsed him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserued. This vvvas granted: and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal, vvho vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first coming, by putting so greata man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him aliue, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campanes: among vvhom, onely this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, vvhist he was at supper, the first night of his coming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon vvhom at the present they could lay hand; or, (vvch is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, vvith those of Capua, ranne some other townes thereabouts, vvch depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casilene, and Acerria, vvcre the Citie next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romanes at this time vvcre not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled townes; but vvcre faine to leaue all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreame feare of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the ouerthrow at Cannæ: and the grieve of that losse was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the prouision against apparant danger. It vvvas hard to iudge, vvwhether the losse already received, or the feare of destruction presently threatening, vvcre the more terrible. All the Senators found vvork enough, to stint the noyse and lamentable bewailings, vvherof the streets were full. Courtiers vvcre sent forth, to bring wordes riding thow all vvhen Letters from the Consul vvvas had throughly informed them; they vvcre amazed; that they vvran into barbarous supposition; & taking direction (as vvvas said) from their fatall bookes, buried alive the men & women drudes and Greekes, in their Oxe-markes. If the bookes of Sibyl giue them such instructions, vvmay iustly thinke; that Sibyl herselfe vvvas instructed by the diuelli. Yea it is not improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to hearken to vvicked sooth-sayers, vvwhose detestable counsells they afterwards, for their own honor (as alledged of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl: An Embassador was sent to Delphos, to consult with the Oracle of Apollo, & enquire vvhat prayers & supplications they might pacifie the gods, & obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatness of their feare, though not serving to giue remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Prætor Octavius, vvhom the Senate had appointed; if he found it meet, to passe over into Africa: In these vvcre contained newes, of one Carthaginian Fleet, that vvwaited the kingdome of Hieron their good friend & confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Isles of Sicily, vvch vvvas in readines to set vpon Lilybæum; the rest of the Roman Prouince, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron, in the midst of these extremities, it vvvas thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consul: that he might name a Dictator, to take soveraign charge of the Weale publique; vvith absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people vvvent forth to meet the Consul, & bid him vvelcome home; giuing him thanks for that he had not despaired of the weale publique. But this vvvas done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: vvch therein (doubtlesse) provided vvvasely, for vvvhoulding the generall reputation. If his coming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations & out-cries of the people: vvhat else vvould haue followed, than a contempt of their vvretchednes, among those that vvvere subiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their vvwelcome, and thanks; they noysed abroad a vvame, vvch came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity & Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore vvvas vvvasely done. But vvwhereas Livius vvould haue vs thinke, that it vvvas done generously, & out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleue him not. It vvvas done fearfully, and to couer their grieves: Had they dared to shew their indignation, they vvould haue stricke off his head; as in few vvweeks after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question; & vvvas banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a small offence. M. Minus, by appointment of the Senate, vvvas nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse: These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of vvvhom they raised foure new Legions, and a 1000. horse: though vvwith much difficulty, as being faine to take vp some, that vvvere very Boyes. These foure Legions are elsewhere forgotten in accompe of the forces leuiued by this Dictator; and two Legions only set downe, that had bin enrolled in the beginning of the vvyear for custody of the Citie. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field; foure new ones of Prætextati, or striplings vvvere left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, & so few, little confidence vvvas to be reposed, for vvvhich reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them 8000. sturdy slaves, that vvvere put in hope of liberty, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not vvvasufficing, the Dictator proclaimed; That vvvhosoever ought mony & could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthvvith be discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he vvould serue in the war. To arme these Companies, they vvvere faine to take down, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bin there set vp; among vvvhich, vvvere 6000. Armors of the Gauls; that had bin carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romanes, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they vvvere faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, vvwhen Hannibal vvvas ready to encounter them vvwith his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it vvvas, that Carthago, vvwith the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannæ, came to Rome: Castulo vvvas not admitted into the Citie, but commanded, vvwhilst he vvvas on the way, to be gone ere high out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captiues audience vvvas giuen by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publique charge; not only the teares & lamentation of their poore kinsfolke, but the great need, vv wherein the Citie then stood, of able Souldiers, vvcommending their their fute; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former Warre) not to be so tender of such as had yielded to the enemy; much was alledged against these who now craped ranfome: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might haue saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to auoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the 10 flaues which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ranfomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, deuised to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had bene seuerer, when as indeed they were futable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggarly. Mercof it is no little prooffe, That Hannibal valued those Roman flaues, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ranfome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat hee thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for flaues might haue bene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuate men; yet must we withall consider, that these priuate men did onely lend these flaues for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forebear the price 20 of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the War should be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would haue bene his Chapmen: but seeing he dealt onely for ready money, they chose rather to say, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like austeritie, vpon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was vsed toward the souldiers that escaped from that great Battaille. These were charged for hauing fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if euer) that which they call raggione del Stato may serue for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being driuen 30 to a miserable exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing iniuries to priuate men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had serued at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twenty yeeres in the Warres, or else were fifty yeeres of age; but vntill this Warre should be ended, how long fouer it lasted, and that without reward. The same thrifty censure, was afterwards laide vpon others, for their misbehaviour: but neuer vpon any man of quality, saue only (a good while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brained fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wittes with the terrour of so great a losse, were deuising, after the battaille, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed 40 by a Tribune of the people; neuerthelesse it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparant than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with fife and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake estate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofilia, with a Fleet ready to set saile for Sicily, hauing one Legion aboard his ships, and fiftene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces hee 50 was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Canna, hee sent these of his new Leuy to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusinum: deliuering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanians) to let in the Carthaginians; and knew not how to auoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberat about the articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore hee made great iourneys thitherward; and arrived euen time enough enough to procure the Enemy. Many idle words, and many idle actions, hee was thought to say, saying by faine words, &c. terrible threats, the one to the other Citie, Capua was strong, and not infected with the least touch of dishonour; but also to a sure sign, that by it should in the last end, be sustaining much inconvenience, by spoyle of the Ilands and Villages abroad in the Country. But at last it was thought, a wiser consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field, which if he laid waste all the poore people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude of such talke vsed some, that had little feare of their own private want or poverty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginians. Of these, one Labentius was chiefe; a stout young gentleman, and Souldier of speciall mark, well beloued in the Citie; one that had done good seruice to the Roman 10 armie, was wounded by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle viliage, and tendance, and cure of his wvounds, friendly dismissed with libtall gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to retorne the greatest thanks he could to so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wronged vpon the same 20 one of the Gentleman, and taking notice of him, as if it had bene by chance, began to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman State, had not repaid unto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly noted for his personall valour, he made this Labentius so fast in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently 30 the command. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola, and layd by, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison, vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Adria; vvhich he tooke by composition, and so returned backe againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, being 40 oppressed by the Roman Garrison, yet if they saw Marcellus hardly beset, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting vnto the accomplishment 50 of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but only to shew of a meaning to force the Towne, which he sought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messages betwene him and the Citie, his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his 60 forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise, and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, euen to find him busied within the Citie, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the vvaies, he thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes. 70 Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three seuerall gates looking toward the enemy: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder, against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, euery day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the wales were bare, and not a man appearing on them, then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied 80 with the Citizens. Whereupon he bad his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walle, and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected fallie the 90 more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, vvere some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like sort issued they of the new leuied Companies, vpon the enemies backs. The sudden terror was more auailable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the brattest 100 performed in all that Warre; forasmuch as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about therefore & even of high Treason, who should be made off, & so leaving the Town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, vnto the same hard by about Suessula in the meane season was gotten to Capua: whither being excluded, he thought best to come to Capua, to see time to persuasions, but he was not able to do so. This terrified the People, who knew that he was not able to hold out there before his Works were finished, and they quite surrounded, they stole in by night and left him the Town empty: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing news of the Dictator, that he was about Capua, thither went Marcellus: as being unwilling that an Enemy so neere should disquiet him at Capua, where he meant to winter. He came, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginians: who durst with a small part of his Army seek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slain in plaine battaille, but by a sudden eruption; which chanced, in what great feare they stood of Hannibal, & how Crest-fallen they were, after having three years since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleasure, by his own Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good news, to hear, That in a skirmish not far from Roma he appeared to be a man, and not rashly. At Capitulum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, & held it. Five hundred of the Prætorians there were, and about foure hundred of Romans, with some of the Latin. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the battaille at Canna, being sent by their severall States to the Campe; whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them, & sent them back sorrowfull, for they loved well their Lords the Romans, vnder whose government they liued happily. So came they all one after another to Capua, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Capua were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Prætorians and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laide one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Town (for it was diuided by the Riuer Vulturum) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Capua were as the rest of the Campanes; all Traitors, they themselves might haue bin reputed, as no better than the Adumbrates. But their constancy in defence of the place willeth, vpon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more worke than he expected. Divers assaults he gaue, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemy minded, and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driuen to close them vp, and seek to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher vp the Riuer: who faine would haue relieved Capua, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had giuen him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the ouerflowings of Vulturum; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leaue them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his iourney, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Capua. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrels of corne were sent by night, floting down the Riuer; & when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stucke among the Willows on the bank, wherby this manner of reliefe was discouered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length when all food was spent, and whatfoeuer grew Greene vnder the Wall was gathered for Sallets; the Carthaginians ploughed vp the ground: whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience, and said, That he meant not to stay at Capua, vntill the Rape were grown. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others; by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent rate: in which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Capua, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes, vnto whom he restored it. To the Prætorians Souldiers great thanks were giuen, and louing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Prætorians; which is no weak proofe, of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subiect to the Roman Government. This siege of Capua was not a little beneficiall to the Romans, as hauing long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise haue bin better spent. For Winter ouer-took him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honour he knew when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army; he rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, & made it effeminate; though, as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was so long deferred: That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

When Mago, the son of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaille at Canna, his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, & thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the ioyfull message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chased, wounded, or slain; how the stout Romans, that in the former war neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he neuer durst adventure to come to battaille; That, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them about two hundred thousand, and taken about fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Sentians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy; that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Campanes; but the chiefe seat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had bin entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, vntill their supply. As for the war, He said it was euen at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was far from home, in the Enemies Country; that so many battailles had much diminished his brothers Armie: that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with obligations of money, corne, and other necessities; but that these things must be sent from Carthage: which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, he caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slain, to be powdered out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels; or (as others would rather haue it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the principall of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament.

Who so considers the former Punicke Warre, may easily find, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the durance thereof, any such hopeful aduertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no marvaile, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this ioy, Himilco, a Senator aduersely to the faction of Hannibal, did to haue demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome.

Whether

* Thus Livy reports it: and credible it is that while home was poore, the bravery of private men was not altogether so great, as the Law would haue permitted; though otherwise Livy Amali. The wearing of the ring, was the generall privilege of the Roman Equites.

Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded vp vnto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to giue thanks vnto the gods, for this their good successe: Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formall answer, which Liue puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti; by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull overthrow receiued at the Islands Agathis: yet the summe of his speech appeares to haue been no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno, saying, that his hatred against the Barbines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not; with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a iest of these victories, as is reported; saying, It ill becomed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled forsooth with spoyle, to make request for meate and money. To these cauls, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaues, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine conuoy of money and prouisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Prouince, (as the two Scipios are afterwards said to haue done, when they wanne the campe of Asdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his journey towards Italie) then might such an obiection more iustly haue been made vnto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oracion, and therein he best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to seeke peace, whilest they had so much the better in warre.

What would haue been the issue of this counsaile, if it had been followed; it were not easie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would haue brooked much indignity, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely that the Romans so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue bin kept entire, when any opinion of good aduantage had called for reuenge of so many shameful overthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submissiue behaviour could preserue Carthage from ruine, longer than vntill such time, as Rome was at leisure from all other warres. This counsaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeed very pestilent; and serued onely to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Nomidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of slaues, should be sent ouer to Hannibal; and that besides these, twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be leaied in Spaine; not onely to supply, as need should require, the Armies in that Prouince; but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it bene as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not haue found cause, to taxe the retchlesse improuidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canna to Rome, or in refreshing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would haue finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduenture; and the pleasures, which his men enioyed among the Campanes, would haue been commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following Warre. But either the too much carelessnesse of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreme necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellowes, working vpon the priuate humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commodity, than sense of the publike neede; vtterly perueried, and made vprofitable in the performance, the order that had bene so well set downe. The Elephants were sent; and some money peraduenture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of three score thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed, by time, and sundry accidents of warre. Onely some small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the journey of Asdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Here we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes receiued from their subjects; and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize: For it is not long, since the Warre of the Mercenaries; and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelue hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage; which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeming of peace, after the losse at Agathis. Yet wee see, what great Armies of Nomidians; and Spaniards, besides those already on foote, are appointed to the seruice in Italie; and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of money in these chargeable vndertakings; whereas the Romans, on the other side, hauing three or foure yeeres together bene forced to some extraordinary cost; are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meane to enrich their Treasury; had the weakly Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, euen from Tyru their Mother-Citie in the bottome of the Streights vnto the great Ocean, about the Romans; who liued on the fruites of their ground and receiued their Tributes from people following the same course of life: When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falsehood; in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discouered plainly whence the realousie was bred, that this mighty City would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, hauing giuen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Army did set forth, to performe whatsoever should be enioyned them, with condition that their City might not be destroyed; and hauing accordingly, when they were so required, yielded vp all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall; but the Town must needs be demolished, and remooued into some other place, that should be twelue miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of Merchandize; by which yee now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies; and make them very apt for conuerfation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glossing words plainly shewes, what good obseruation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, he added still this conclusion, Thui Tiburke; and thus Carthage should be destroyed; He may seeme, not onely to haue had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the City; but much more vnto these times, and the great height wherunto it rose; euen suddenly as wee see, one of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a Warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skillfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: hauing euery one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefite. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heate of their affection (wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly) was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couetous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was secured, they might send an Army into Italie, so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Government of an ambitious man, and his brethren, who hauing once (if they could so do) finished the warre, might easily make Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that he had giuen them to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne slacknesse, incredulity, dulnes, or nigardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disbursements in Spaine, than to set vp altho their rest at once in Italie. Yet was it indeed impossible, to hold a Countrey of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of Spaine, free from all incursions of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had bene to make a running Warre, by which

which the Romans might have bin found occupied, even vwith the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition therunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their maijue intendment against Rome it self, vntill such time as ouerly little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province, then must Emporia haue bin besieged and forced: vvhich by reason of alliance with the Masilians, gaue vnto the Romans at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the towne of Emporia was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; hauing not above foure hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified, a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gracians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this towne of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would haue bin a worke of little lesse difficulty, than vvas the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the seare of the vvarre, which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborne, great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans vnto the out of Spaine: vvhom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawn home to their own doores, by making strong vvar vpon their City. For euen so the Romans afterwards remooued Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeouored to change the seate of the vvar, transferring it out of Italie into Spaine. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is necessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno vvas a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were wall enough contented to hearken vnto his discourtes, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane vvvhile they suffered Hannibal, & all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in trauaile for the Common wealth: vvhich all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Carthaginians had bin somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were far lesse honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their subiect Provinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their private interest. But as they thiried little in the end, by their parsimony vsed toward their own Mercenaries, vvhen the former Roman war was finished: so the conclusion of this vvar present, will make them complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Canna; vvhen gladly they vould giue all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spaine.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it self, depended wholly, or for the most part, vpon success of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouvernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Linie, the tender loue of his own Country, vvhich made him giue credit vnto Fabius & others: yet must we not, for his sake, beleue those lies, which the vnpartial iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers, that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntuth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former vvar, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves vnto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set downe by Emilius Probus. That Eryx vvas in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not bin any vvar. These words, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouer liberall. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Catalus when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Arms and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise he vould not talke of any composition:

Amilcar

Amilcar boldly had him chuse, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the Armenians, which his Country had put into his hands to vse against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to giue vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custome vpon like changes, were content to let Amilcar haue his wil, & not to stand with him vpon point of honour, vvhal so otherwise they might quickly rid their hands of him, plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hannibal agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatterly, & by name, charged Fabius vwith vntuth, saying, that howsoeuer Amilcar, & his Souldiers, had ended his extremitie, yet they behaued themselves as men that had no sense therof; and were farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman Age) & those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty City of Rome: vvhat take it in good part, that howsoeuer Linie introduceth Hanno, in one place, ioyning his foolishly his own shamefull overthrow at the Hands, Agateus, vwith the great Agateus of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like euent; yet elsewhere he forgeth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battaile at Senna, wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, vwith Val. Antias, & others of the like stamp, had then written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Linie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations which are such as follow.

6. XI.

Reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar had thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

It hath bin shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gallicia into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cnaeus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, vwith foureteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had bin allotted vnto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spaine against Hannibal: who since he vvas marching into Italie with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio beleueed, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; & therefore made bold to carry some of the number backe with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remained in Italie all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and as they are reported, somewhat maruellous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, and with-drew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we haue cause to wonder, how the enemy could so often find means to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily win vnto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the Carthaginian yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serue to arme the Naturals against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had revolted vnto the Romans; were it only by the memory of such ill success, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poor and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars; or seruing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durst be bold to say it, the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great as they are set out by Linie. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Linie in his person, maketh an obiection, vnto Scipio, vvvhich neither Scipio, nor Linie for him, doth doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italia. And it is indeede an incredible curation, That Asdrubal being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how so to escape out of his taile, saue onely by the steepe descent of Roques, ouer a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his mony, Elephants, & broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly towards the Pyrennees, and so toward Italy, vpon which he felt with more than threescore thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that this his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans, for so much they said to have done in the last battaile between him & Scipio from breaking into his Camp. Therefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being vtterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdom to giue much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run ouer the doings of the Scipios in Spain; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Pol. lib. 3.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Hauentowne, not farre within the Pyrennees, retaining still the same name with little infection. That by the fame of his clemency, he allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vse his clemency, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and hauing no mediation in the Country. Yet it is certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his demerity in practice had the better successe, for that he seemed to haue none other end, than setting them at liberty. This pretext auailed with some: Others were to be lured with mony: and some he compelled to yeeld by force or feare, especially, when he had won a battaile against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that he remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliance neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maiestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conseruent, which is, as Tullio interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Maiestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeede an obscure couenant of subiection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditumis Romanis; of the Roman iurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would makethem start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Gouvernour ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Prouince between Iberus and the Pyrennees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principality of their Country vnto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him not only Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all Inferiour Officers of their own, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times proue worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanus, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards, and French; as more trouble still of the present euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, wherinto they ran by seeking to auoide it. This bad affection of his Prouince, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Prouince. Therefore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein he was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Sstifum, a Towne hard by, and wonne it.

It. But Asdrubal hauing passed Iberus, and comming too late, to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarrason, whom he found carelesse, as after a victory, routing abroad in the country; and with great slaughter draue them aboard their ships. This done, hee ranne up into the Country, where he withdrew the Illegetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his Fleete: where hauing set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his comming, but withdrew himselfe againe ouer Ibernus. So the Illegetes were compelled by force; hauing lost Abanagia their chiefe Cite, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Antiochians likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping, in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to dislodge. But they were haire as length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of silver. During the siege, the Lacernians came to helpe their distressed Neighbours, and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thousand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacernians, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should without any cause remembered, become Carthaginians on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntarily ditumis Romanis, should in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleue, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Illegetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilst himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus saith, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Country, was beaten by Asdrubal backe to his ships, whence he did not stirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the land of his Prouince, leauing some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio's coming, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for through a deepe snow. As for the Lacernians, Illegetes, and the rest, wee may reasonably thinke, that they fought their owne benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, vpon sense of iniuries receiued, or apprehension of more grieuous tyranny, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, harkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Countrey Lawes, and not vnder Gouvernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: euen from hencefoorth vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar; till when they were neuer thoroughly conquered.

Lin. lib. 21.

They were following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea, or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too farre on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, about one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates, in Spaine, are said to haue submitted themselves vnto the Romans, or giuen Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flie into the vtmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Lucitania. Yet it followes; that the Illegetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus, and that Scipio (though hauing lately vanquished the Illegetes) went not forth to meete him, but stirred vp against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subiects, and had giuen him Hostages. These were from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes, where they slew fiftene thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then arrived Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren jointly administered the businesse in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipios did but quietly, without both feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal.

Asdrubal, being the Governor of Spain, a simple man, suffered himself to be persuaded by one Acadice Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour of his country was by freely restoring unto them their Hollage secured in by oath any pledge, assured of their faith: But the crafty Spaniard, being argu'd with this message & restitution of the Hollage, carried them all to the Carthaginians, persuading them, as he had done Publius to make the Liberty their own: Hollage was a Spaniard purchased much longer, if the tale were true; & if it were not rather true, as afterward, and he this we find, that all the Spaniards Hollage were left in the hands of the Carthaginians. I am weary of rehearsing to many particulars, whereof I can believe so few. But since we had no better certainties, we must content our selves with these few.

The yeare following was like unto this: Asdrubal must be beaten again. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. Scipio by Land; & P. Scipio by Sea: Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten some thousand foot, & five hundred horse, over a strait he repairs his Fleet; and provides every way to make resistance: But his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, revolt unto the Romans; because they had been chidden the last yeare for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an Island people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain: These do much mischief; so that Asdrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields: But they, making head, so valiantly assaile him, that they drive him, for very feare, to encamp himself strongly on an high piece of ground, whence he dares not come forth to give them battaile. Some take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Country round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes upon them, takes them vnprepared, beastes them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage; that Asdrubal should lead his Army forth into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had bin informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported: and that upon the very rumour of his his journey, almost all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so; for, if they will needs haue it so, that then they must send him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to employ they should find worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much-mooued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needs be gone; Himilcar, with such forces as are thought expedient for that service both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himselfe with store of money, that he might haue wherewithall to win the friendship of the Gauls, through whose Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembring to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he layes great Impositions upon all the Spaniards his subjects: and hauing gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward the marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these news, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They bessege Iliturgi (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who the upon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home, than get the victory, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were fully ioyned. Their Camp the Romans take, and spoile: whereby questionlesse they are maruellously enriched, in the money that could be raked together in Spain, being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes euent ioynes all Spain to the Romans: If any part of the Country stood in doubt before, and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of traueilling into Italy, that he leaves him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisement is sent to Rome, and Letters to the Senate, from P. Scipio, and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are, That they haue neither money, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Army and Fleet; That alls wanting, so as vnlesse they may be supplied from Asdrubal can neither hold their forces together, nor stay any longer in the Province: they therefore come to Rome in an euill season: the State being scarcely able, after the loss of Cannae, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of Optatus and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common wealth, shall be inserted else where, into the relation of things whereof the truth is less questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke, that remember the last newes of him, and how fearefully he mistruft his own safetie? They find him, and Mago de Amilcar the sonne of Bomilcar, with an Army of three score thousand men, besseging Iliturgi: (which the learned Strabo, and others, probably conceive to haue stood, where Carimena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon, for there was likewise afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Ilitergetes their nearest Neighbours, for hauing revolted vnto the Romans. The towne is greatly distressed, but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore brake through betweene the Enemies Campes, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and hauing beset the place, encourage the townes-men to defend their walls as stoutly, as they about Iliturgi beheld them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they were forth, about sixteen thousand against three score thousand; and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, draue all the three Carthaginian Com-manders, every one out of his quarter; and tooke that day, besides prisoners and other spoils, fiftie and eight Ensignes.

The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Iliturgi, fall vpon Incibili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by warre, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driven to poll the Country, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten in his iourney, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battaile. Howsoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them about thirteen thousand slaine, and about three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Publius, Valerius Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Linie gaue credit, conquer all Spain twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. Scipio and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their owne side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are buerthrowne by him: P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great hast ouer the River. At Gastum altum, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defensible, intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Country round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, & are gotten off close; falling also vpon some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows: so much they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Publ. withdrawes himselfe vnto Mons victorie: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouerlooketh the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; & Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions: As they lie there incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himselfe to an high piece of ground, where they bessege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetcht him off. After this (but I know not why) Cassito, a great City of Spain, where Hannibal had taken him a wife, ioyneth with the Romans, though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Doeris. Neuertheless the Carthaginians could ouer Iberus, to bessege Iliturgi again, wherein together a Roman partison hoping to win it by famine. We may iustly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Cassito, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek for adventures further off, in that very place, where they had been so grievously beaten.

the yeer before. But thither they goe, and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out vpon them the next day, and in two battels kils about twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with sixe and thirty Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Manda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio bene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, & twelue thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and feuen and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auriges; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kils not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed euen by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal, who hauing also hired some of the Gaules, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen ashamed, to leaue Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Country once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appeares) to goe their way without it: so as they need not to blush, for hauing so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restored the possession thereof vnto such of the poore disperfed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the country of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue disturbed them, if they had been able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, we can perceiue none, than this recouery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubal's iourney; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporiae, an Haven towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phocæans, kinne to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They haue easily wonne to their party, lost, recouered, and lost againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion; other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnsettled passions; and now finally they haue won a town, whereof the Carthaginians held intire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleue, that when they took Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembered, after euery one of which Asdrubal fate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Town to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leue and arriual of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeere following, in practising onely with the Celtiberians the next adioyning people: Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeers businesse. Of these Celtiberians we heare before, That they haue yielded vp themselves vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, giuen Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought, and not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue, perceiue; while perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, whether the custome of some bad Author whom I followe, or call euery messenger, or stranger, that entred their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came, and would not be sure. The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and entred into Italy, there to deale with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spaine, lets to be feared, that he bringe with him such news of the riches and wealth of Hannibal's men, that all his followes at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall hear haue a desire to leade them into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability; when these Mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, pretending on this acesse of strength, diuide their forces, and seek out the Enemies, who haue sent out with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; euen among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good fight: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; the sonne of Gisco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is but dayes march; and, by running into the furthest parts of the Country, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Rubius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers; that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer iourney to make, would somewhat the sooner to his liues end: Asdrubal and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessity. They ioine their forces together, meet with Publius Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is faine to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Ascanassa, Prince of the Massilyli, Numidians bordering vpon Mauritania; in the Region called now Tremizen; to whom the chiefe honor of this seruice is ascribed; for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, accoming with seven thousand & six hundred of the Suesetani, to loyne with his Enemies: Fearing therefore to be streight shut vp, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leauing T. Pontius his Licutenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appeare (whom he thought to haue been ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, vncertaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men; where need most requiteth, is stricke through with a lance, and slaine very few of his Army escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The second hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him, pretending that they had warre in their owne Country. If Anitorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Orselius following Asdrubal takes it, a Celtiberian towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparant truth. We may iustly beleue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them, and no lesse vnable, without their helpe, either to resist the enemy, or to loyne with his brother, maketh a very violent retreat; which onely differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard vpon him: and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, hauing made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio scales from them all, by night; and ouertaken the next day by their horse, and arrested in an open place of hard stony ground; where growes not so much as a shrubbe; vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he findes of easie ascent on euery side, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weak defenses the Carthaginians see done reare in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, slay very few of the malices, that sauing themselves, I know not how, within some woods adioyning, escape vnto Publius, whom Publius had left in his campe, as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escaped. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on euery every side, in so bare ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could breake out, and throwd themselves within woods adioyning, I should much wonder, did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Pontellus is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life, since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a prettie Armie. The Souldiers, bring to choise a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Pontellus the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Afrubal, the sonne of Gesco comming vpon them; this L. Martius so incourageth his men, (fondly weeping when he led them forth, vpon remembrance of their intire honourable Generalls lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might haue gotten but that he wisely sounds the retrain; reseruing the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his aduantage, they return to their former security; and vterly despising him, set neither Corps de guard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neere. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with lively words; and tels them, That there is no aduenture more safe, than that which is sure. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of seruice. So he leades them forth by night, and steals vpon the Campe of Afrubal: vvhether finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleepe, or very drowzie. He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbines, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians run head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Campe, Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and run away toward the Campe of Afrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay sixe miles off. But Martius hath way-led them. In a Valley betwene their two campes he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall euery one, and are cut in pieces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied vvith their former execution, Hee driues head-long into flight, all that can saue themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirty seuen thousand of the enemies perish in this nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius addes, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuen thousand slaine: and that in another battaile vvith Afrubal, there were slaine ten thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Linie therefore hath elsewhere vvell obserued, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Linie reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth. That this Captaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if vvith so small forces, and in such distresse, He could cleerely get off from the Enemies, & giue them any parting blow, though it were farre lesse than that which is here set downe.

Of these occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good seruice, vvhatsoeuer it was, but setting it out in such vvise, as the Senate might iudge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spaine: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued vvith the tidings than the case required: and therefore took such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spaine, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the companies leuied to serue in that Prouince, could be sent away; yet vvould they not stay: a tide for defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and vvere offended at his presumption in vsurping it: foreseeing well, that it vvould amatter of ill consequence, to haue the souldiers abroad make choise among themselves, for holding that should command Armes and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius, vvho vvith dispatche vvith all contentment haste, vvith Spaine carrying vvith him about fower thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines; vvith three hundred Roman horse, & of the Latines eight hundred, came to the Campe of Afrubal, the sonne of Amilcar. It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome began to prosper in Italy, & afforded meane of offeinding abroad such strong supply: othervvise, the victories of Martius vvould ill haue serued, either to keep footing in Spaine, or to stop the Carthaginian Armes from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing vvith his new forces, tooke charge of that remanent of the Army, which was vvnder Martius and Pontellus, he found surer tokens of the ouerthrowes receiued, than of those miraculose vvictories, vvhereof Martius had made his vaunts vvnto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: vvhom how to reclaime, it vvould not easily be deuised. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Afrubal the brother of Hannibal: vvhom he found among the Ausetani, neer enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides vris, out of vvhih there was no issue, but onely through a streight, vvhereon the Roman seized at his first comming. Vvhat should haue tempted any man of vnderstanding, to incampe in such a place, I doe not finde: and as little reason can I find in that vvhih followed. For it is said, That Afrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vvith, made offer to depart forth vvith out of all Spaine, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Arme might be thence dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in enterdayning parlee vvith Claudius about this businesse; That night by night he conueighed his footmen (a few at a time) through vvery difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking aduantage of a misty day, He stole away vvith all his Horse and Elephanes, leauing his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Afrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spaine; we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, vvho hoped to conclide a bargain for so great a Country, vvith one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through vvhih the footmen could hardly creepe out by night, the Horse and Elephanes easily following them in a darke misty day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, vvith the danger vvherein the Carthaginians vvere, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue been of far lesse value. Howsoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recover the old vvhih they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, vvhih had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not vvell, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor vvhom they fancied not so vvell. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) yong Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity; vvhere needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memory of C. and Publius, likely to doe good, vvere it reuiued in one of the same family. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons, C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spaine.

This is that Scipio, vvho after vvard transferred the warre into Africk: vvhere he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, & singularly vvell conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Contrinency, Bounty, and other vvirtues that purchase loue, of vvhih qualities vvhat great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that he reported of him, sauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; How he vvished to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference vvith Iupiter; How a Dragon (vvhih must haue been one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed vvith his Mother, entering her Chamber often, & vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than fables, deuised by Historians, vvho thought thereby to adde vvnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Circle might seeme, not onely to haue surpassed other Nations in vvirtue of the generality, but also in great vvorth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is evidently vvritten, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconfull was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, no one of them having the heart to adventure himselfe in such a desperate service; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twentie yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Prouince, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the two partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconfull into Spaine; and with him was ioyned M. Iunius Silanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinguereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporiz, and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the same of Scipio's arrivall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with such a maiestic, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly affraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. If we must beleue this, then must we needs beleue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived together with him. He assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wonne it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue bene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walles, whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a demi-Iland, betwene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walles, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had sounded; and finding some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading vp to the Nauill, Scipio thrust therinto some Companies of his men, who recovered the top of the walles without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Liue himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk & Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adioyning Prouinces) whom Scipio intreated with singular courtesie, restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Illegetes & Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, & ioyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Illegetes, is much commended: for that he did not vaunt himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vse, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuolting from their enemies, but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by iniuries of the Carthaginians, & inuited by the honourable dealing of

Scipio.

Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no vnsecure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Illegetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Scipio; then could nothing haue bin deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis to their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when hee should haue rather craued pardon for his breach of Alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoeuer the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, & held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer masters of the Countrie, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won vnto himselfe the assured loue and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet neuertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, hauing stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne coniecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth toward Italy; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, were done before Ibero. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage over the Lake had bene vndiscovered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howsoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generality of the business, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his iourney, Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal, the son of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprise: euen to fight in tryall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fauion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal; his Vantcurrers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drew them into their Trenches: and made it apparant, euen by that small peece of service, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of access on the foreside; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly encamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betwene the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more vpon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within the Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazzard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such aduantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climbed vp the Hill to him; they recovered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flie. Out of such a battaile, wherein hee had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to haue marched toward the Pyrenes, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Neuertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, are reported after this, to haue consalted with him about this Warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe hee needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue bin true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

S. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. Posthumius the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls; Philip King of Macedon, entering a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans joining with the Aetolians, make warre upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WHe left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates reioyced (as may be thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence vnto him. In former times he had found worke enough, to carry the Romans come into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Armie; by making him Master of the open field. He might perhaps haue forced some walled townes; in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Cannæ: but he spent much time; about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Armie must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill come were ripe, would haue grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may haue been the reason, why he forbore to aduenture vpon Rome, after his victorie at Cannæ. For had hee failed: (as it was a matter of no certaintie) to carry the Citie at his first comming; waite of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterprife. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the cunct of another battaile: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessities to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walles of Rome, he had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receiue a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subiection. Thus the Winter was passed ouer ioyfully, sauing that there came not any tydings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arriued no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had about thiny of them; whereas all, saue one, that he brought ouer the Alpes, had bin lost in his journey through the Marshes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence; they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselfe had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauen, to receiue the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere serued, He tooke the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Cassilum, fought to make himselfe Master of some good Huentowne therabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilco vnto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicily & Sardinia; since the siege of Rome, must needs be deferred vnto another yeer. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slew aboue two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petellia or Petolia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Consentia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto him; as did all other places thereabout, except onely the Towne of Rhegium, born against Sicily. The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded; as a notable testimony of the good gouernment, vnder which the Roman subiects liued. As for the Samnites, Campanians, and others, whose caracters in rebellion may seduce to proue the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Souerainty, and were now transported with ambition; which reason can hardly moderate, or benefite allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe; where their Messengers receiued answer from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not so many instances, to relieue their Associates, that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a priuate iurisdiction within themselves) sel down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoeuer was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to turne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne safetie, as hauing already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths; and hauing striuen in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloody victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants. The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For where, in a great brauerie, before their losse at Cannæ, they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad, was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumius, Albinius their Prator they had sent, with an Armie of fife and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian king Pinues they had sent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip king of Macedon they had sent, to require, that he should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Phariar, their Subiect and Rebel, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Armie was cut in pieces by the Gauls; in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Lisana, through which he was to passe. Against his coming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees so far, that a little force would serue to cast them downe. When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gauls, that lay about the wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouerwhelmed. Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of sawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceiued, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuce was subiect, I do not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue bene done: and what failed in the stragem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the sauage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countie now so ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleaned, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessel, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse than the calamity. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Suerdileus Illyrian kings, as also with Gemius, who reigned within a few yeers following, the Romans dealt vpon euen termes, entreating their assistance against Philip and Persus, not committing their dutie, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For Having assured his affaires in Greece, & enjoying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, He sent Embassadors to Hannibal: with whom he made a league; vpon these conditions: That the King in person should come into Italy; and with all his forces, by Land and Sea; that the Carthaginians in the Roman war, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoile therein to be gotten, should be left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, vntill hee had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the *Ætoli*ans, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving semblably vnto him the full possession of that country, and the Isles adjoyning. But such predisposition of Kingdoms and Princes, is lightly controlled by the diuine Providence, which therein seemed to himselfe, as Herodotus fully termes it; and like an Antichrist: enuious, or malicious, but very iust and maiestically, in vp-holding that vnspokeable greatesse of Soueraignty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadour that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: & being examined what they were, aduencured vpon a bold saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a league with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessitie. These newes were so welcome, that the ioy thereofooke away all care of making better inquiry. So they were longly feasted and freely dismissed with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to auoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their journey, fell wilfully into the campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse, about which they came, vpon the points before remembered. In their returne homeward, they happened againe vnlooktly to be destroyed by the Roman fleet; which, mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gaue them chase. They did their best to haue escaped; but being ouer-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboard; and trusting to the lie that once had serued them, said it againe, That hauing bene sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were notable, by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before: and (which marred all) Gesco, Nosar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition serued to finde all out: so that at length Hannibal's owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadours and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon new Emassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before, onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heauy weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likly to fall vpon them, when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and sutable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would haue beate vpon them from Spaine. They iudged it more easie, with small forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, ioyning with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegiance, not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subjects, but euen of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the City; it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twenty Quingentis Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begunne. Philip was busie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italy, setting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling vpon Oricum, which he won, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirots craued helpe of M. Valerius (or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townsmen in good order, but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip was then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand thousand men, vnder Numius Crispus, an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. Thence made a notable sallie; and brake into Philip's Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his campe, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to haue departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the Riuer, so that he was faine to burn his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the *Ætoli*ans, a Nation alwayes enemy to the Crowne of Macedon; and easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath else where bene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the *Ætoli*ans, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberall in making promise, as if already it had bin his owne. So a league was made betwene them: and afterward solemnly published at Olympia, by the *Ætoli*ans; and by the Romans, in their Capitall. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey should be subdued, and left vnto the *Ætoli*ans, the pillage onely to be giuen to the Romans. And that if the *Ætoli*ans made peace with Philip, it should bee with Prouision, to hold no longer than whilest hee abstained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the onely point, whereto Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalfe. That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, vnlesse it were with like condition of including the *Ætoli*ans. Into this league was place reserved for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleauratus, and Scerdileus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to giue it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The *Ætoli*ans alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Darmachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had onely the title of Navarre, was said to court the Maiors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when hee heard wherunto the *Ætoli*ans tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infect the kingdome of Macedon, wasted the Countrey about Oricum & Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessaly, whence he made shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to stir vp all the Greeks adioyning, against the *Ætoli*ans; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrey. To which purpose, and to hinder the *Ætoli*ans from breaking into Greece, He left Perseus, his son and heire, with foure thousand men, vpon their borders: with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should ouer-take and entangle him. Hee made a long journey into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, whensoever the King was absent. The *Ætoli*ans, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrey, ere he should be able to returne. Hereto it much auailed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniadæ and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes conveniently situated to let in an Armie; and consigned them vnto the *Ætoli*ans, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, not to die (as we say) euery Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Countrey; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who layed aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the *Ætoli*ans to forsake their enterprife. When this Expedition was giuen ouer, the Romans and *Ætoli*ans fell vpon Ancyra, which they took: the Romans assailing it by Sea, the *Ætoli*ans by Land. The *Ætoli*ans had the Towne, and the Romans the spoile.

For these good seruices M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius sent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus of Asia came ouer to assist the *Ætoli*ans. Hee was chiefly moued by his owne ialousie loue of Philips greatness: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity of being chosen by the Ætolians their principall Magistrare; which honour, though as better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the force which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being ioyned with the maine power of Ætolia; Philips tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome neighbours desired peace of him; and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadors, instead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable conditions; as ill befecimed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being besieged in their owne Towns, that had made them desirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis, which threatened Achaia; wherein Philips then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Nassipaci, wasted the country in a terrible brauery: wherein Philips requited them; conning vpon them in great haste from the Nemæan Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heate of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philips, sent a Nauie into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians; and vpon greater reason, as being more interested in the successe of his affaires. Philips was too weake by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinquemes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vse the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastening vpon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that country. Ere Philips could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Town, he was incountried by the Ætolian and Roman garrison, which drate him backe with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conuersion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detriment, in his retrait from Elis: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also done after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twenty thousand head of Cattle, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had happened, that in this pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered vp by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well knowne, and the tale believed. At Macedon, therefore was in an uproare: and not only the Borderers, ready to fall vpon the Country; but some Captains of Philips, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in this change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaians. He also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected, that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings, vpon whom he might shortly retorne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill fauouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philips could arrive to helpe it: where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue been lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus: This Citie, lying ouer against Eubœa, Attalus had wonne more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed: now because the Roman soldiers had defrauded him in the sacke of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens, the sudden tidings of Philips arrivall, made him leaue all behinde him, and ranne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships, finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignity of this misadventure; or tydings of Prusias the Bithynian his invasion vpon the kingdome of Pergamus; made Attalus retorne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends. So Philips recovered Opus, wane Torone, Erebonos, Drymon, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Ætolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the tyrant of Lacedæmon, had bene busie in Poloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arrivall, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chooe two new Kings, and to conforme themselves to their old manner of government. But their Estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued no lesse vnfurnate, than had bene their attempts of recouering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant rose vp among them: vpon whom succeeded this Machanidas; & shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian & Roman side, for feare of the Achaians, that were the chief Confederates of Philips; and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speake more hereafter.

Philips entering into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrey; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Orcom, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where find them, such haste they made, for feare of being ouertaken. But flight, hee saide, was not alwayes prosperous: hee should one day light vpon them, as ere this he sundry times had done, and kill to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words, and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation some Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dynæans, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, he fell vpon the Ætolians: whom hee draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Country. This done, he tooke leaue of the Achaians: and returned home by Sea, visited the people that were his subiects, or dependants: and animated them so well, that they rested carelesse of any threatening danger. Then had he leasure to make warre vpon the Dardanians, his neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuer thelesse he was not so far occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldned him to make strong warre vpon the Ætolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates, or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italy; caused them to giue ouer the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Ætolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philips; and accept it; vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fye gallies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aside to Dyrrachium, & Apollonia, making a great noise as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philips came to visit him; and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell; but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close within the wals of Apollonia, making some Ouertures of peace: which caused Philips to return home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philips to take in euil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital; they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his dole from the Roman and Aetolian Pyracies. One by one they came to his helpe, which was, in his last journey, into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arrival: having done nothing, and depending feare of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip, with his own Armie, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him: of his wretched dealing, to the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to have bin one of Hannibal's tricks, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to see that so great a King made dole to serve in prison under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as he could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians, vnto a safe and easy course: which was, not to admit into the follow-ship of their Italian wares, to mighty a Prince, whose change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; on his much affection with Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should doe well to saue changes, and face the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sendinge sweet and speedie succours. This would cost nothing, yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans; & compell them to send part of their forces from home, that might finde this Enemye works abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy; and Philip, when once hee was engaged in the warre, be urged vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea, leaving to the labour of giuing him thanks. Now, if it might come to passe, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were, that the Cities should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betwene them and the Macedonians; rather than that Hannibal, with the power of Africke, should waite vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse rapacious in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Quintus and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to this reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in their little civillie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee began the building of an hundred Gallies; as if hee would let them and others know, where to his proper strength would have reached, had hee not vainely giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Aetolians had submitted themselves already; and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians; but a Potentale to haue succoured them in their necessitie, he might giue over the warre; and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had wilfully entered into trouble for their sakes; but they despised him, as if the quarrell were merely his owne, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, that the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this war, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the covenants; but for what might serue to haue beene gotten. On the other side, the Aetolians were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Orontius probably conceiues) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue dole, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to the selfe.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were the King of Bithynia, the Achaians, Boeotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, & Epirots. On the Roman side were named first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus king of Pergamum; Antiochus, an Illyrian Prince; & Nabis, the tyrant of Macedonia, together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Aetolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Aetolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much vpon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing in all great actions. Yet the setting downe of their names in this Treaty, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a busie people, and ministred occasion to renew the warre, when meanes did better serue to follow it.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieuing the publike necessities of their Common-weale.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had bene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the lesse harmfull, if their care of Italy had bin such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yere to yere, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could haue desired. The death of Posthumus, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their preiudice, in the whole Isle of Sicily, as also that warre, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so neere after their terrible ouerthrow at Cannæ, among so many reuolts of their Italian Confederates, would vtterly haue sunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yere, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuersitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care, and required their severall Armies. This had not bene a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had bene thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue bene strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender troups, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they sent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-neere beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastie catching at Sicily: little deserued to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather euery one of these Actions, considered a part by it selfe, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal, then must hee patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were iealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; & to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumæ, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be reserved for a worke of more importance. Many offers he made vpon Nola, but alwayes with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great maruaile; his forces being then diuided, and employed in sundry parts of Italy. At once, Naples was, euen in those dayes, a strong City; and required a yere worke to haue taken it by force.

Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the town of Canine they of Capua had their plot, & were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chief Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be present at a solemne sacrifice of the Nation, wherethey would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gaules: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being iudged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they faigned so to haue done, because this was the first time, that euer two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of Religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemy in field; yet intentiue to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had beene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, he continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Army skilfull in the exercises of warre, than to keepe it from quarrels, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cumæ sent him word of all that had passed betwene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cumæ: whence hee issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hamæ, three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with foureteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surpris others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore suffering none to goe forth of Cumæ, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meate and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights scruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; losing not aboue a hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tarried not long to rife it, for feare of Hannibal, who lay not farre off. By this his providence, he escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hamæ; forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde those young souldiers, and slaves, busied in making spoile, and loading themselves with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellows spent, about this towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it; which they brought close vnto the walls, thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an high Tower: whence they made resistance; and found meanes at length, to consume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busie in quenching the fire; the Romans, sallying out of the towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their trenches; with the slaughter of about foureteene hundred. The Consul wisely sounded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in readinesse to requite their seruice. Neither would he, in the pride of his good successe, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battell the day following, decere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had raked the field; some small towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people severely punished for their revolt.

The

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it selfe, was driuen in the meane time to alter his course of war: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a generall intiation vpon the whole Countrey, to passe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Sannites, was grieuously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal; as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul, when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and receiued there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soueraigntie. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they ouerburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old, the more easie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intrentiue, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formality, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, & the great preparations which the Romans made, serued to put the Campans in feare, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest entreaty, came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The garrison in Puteoli was sixe thousand strong: and did their dutie so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could onely shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assayed Nola; he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein hee had very great intelligence. Whilest hee was in his progresse thither, Hanno made a iourney against Beneuentum: and T. Gracchus the last yeeres Consul, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanno had with him about foueteene thousand foot, Brutius & Lucius for the most part; besides twelue hundred horse; very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moors. Hee held the Roman worke foure houres, ere it could be perceiued to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed slaves, had receiued from their Generall a peremptory denunciation, That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their liberty, bringing euery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slaine enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the seruice, by imployment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victorie. Gracchus therefore finding his owne error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should haue libertie immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them runne headlong vpon the Enemy; whom their desperate furie had soone ouerthrowne; if the Roman Horse could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard vpon the Romans battell, that foure thousand of the slaves, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the battell, vnto those that should not valiantly beaue themselves) retired vnto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to saue himselfe by flight, when the Grasse of his Armie was broken; being vnable to remedy the losse. Leaving the field, hee was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were horse; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his souldiers that reward of liberty which he had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had recoiled

vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, vnlesse sicknesse forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publike by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaues manumifed) with Caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie, which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first Battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the comming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hamæ, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feed their Townes and Armies, without any surpluse, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italy, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as liuing vpon the same trade, and subiect to the same inconueniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil & Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, euery one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the Poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturalls declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spaine; and the povertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spaine; they resolu'd vpon the onely course, without the which the Citie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to assembly: wherein Quintus Fuluius the Pretor laid open the publique wants; and plainly said, That in this exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; but that such as had stuffe, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours vntill the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuenues, that the charge was vnderaken by priuate men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had bene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentiue to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselves in this present warre. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus: who, after the battell at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had bene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Cannæ, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his Campe, with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; euen whosoeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had vsed to be) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate,

Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serue vntill the end of the warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Cannæ. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vn honest or vnseemely behauiour fell not within the compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publique Horles of seruice, vnto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens liues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rancke; or making them change their Tribe; or (vvhich was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moraltie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man inroached vpon the streets, High-ways, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publique Reuenues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office, as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserue the dignitie of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious vnto the Censors, which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impouerished by warre, and hauing small store of lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with putting the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generositie of the Romans. They that had been accustomed, in more happy times, to vndertake such pieces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and trauell; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had been infranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euery one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quæstor kept a Booke of all that was layed out for the sustenance of these Widowes and Orphans: whilest the whole stocke was vsed by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their country was in so great want.

The twelue hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any iniuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe so much commoditie, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse, if we consider things aright, the calamities of this Warre did rather inable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom she forthwith vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we haue already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman mettall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from euery particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the vniuersality. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciously obserued) That a State, whose dimation or stemme is small, may aptly serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domestickall prosperity is laid aside, and euery mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath seen a great example, in the vnited Prouinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alua; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industrie, and straining themselves to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their seruices by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and about all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the Citie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautifull, should in all reason haue been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleued their owne interest to be as great, in those vvarres which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not haue been throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which kingdoms rise and fall; yet hath left him subiect vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIII.

The Romans winne some Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industrie, in seeking to recover what had beene lost. The towne of Cassilina, Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garrison, and likely to haue been relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Neuerthelessse the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to giue it over: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He said, That many such things, as were not at first to haue been vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted vnto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the towne was pressed so hard, that the Campanians dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craued parlee; offering to giue it vp, so as all might haue leaue to depart in safetie, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diuersly reported) Marcellus seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul: who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safetie; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deferred commendations, by holding his sword good vnto these fifty; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as escaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some equiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marfani in Gascoigne taken by the Marshall Montluc, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their severall guards, vpon hasty desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discovering a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all save the Gouverneur vnto the sword. Herein that Gouverneur of Mount Marfani committed two grosse errors, the one, in that he gaue no order for the Capitaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for assurance giuen and receiued. Some such oversight, the Gouverneur of Cassilina seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Montluc, was very honourable.

table. When this Worke was ended, many small townes of the Samnites, and some of the Lucians and Apulians, were recovered: where in were taken, or slaine, about five and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the country grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sicke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum, waiting to heare from those, that had promised to giue vp the towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propetor had thrust so many men into it, that the traitours durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart, hauing vncared himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the country, but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: vvhich he chose for his wintering place; and began to victuall it, when Summer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne, in vvhich regard if he began his winter more timely, than otherwise he required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessity inforced, to make their Summer last as long as they were able to trauell vp & down the country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicily, vvhither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Province, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique seruice, to imploy oftentimes their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelue Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse-backe, which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who therupon bore to the old Fabius alight, and came to the Consul on his feete. The father cheerfully did so, saying, It was my mind, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to be Consul. Cassius Albinus a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Cannae, had holpen the Carthaginian into that towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it backe vnto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Albinus a patterne to all traitors; vsing him, as Candillus and Fabius had done those, that offered their faithfull seruice against the Falisci, and King Pyrrius. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to requite from the Romans than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he should be sent to the towne of Cales; and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolve what to doe with him, or what use to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, took it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, vvhich were great. Yet that he might seeme rather seuerer, than equetous, he sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitiue, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, he condemned them, as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wonne by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Five thousand of Hannibals Soldiers lay in the towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were trust formost by the Carthaginian Garrison, when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Soldiers held the townsmen suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdome, to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans, protesting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become subiect to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In proceffe of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor was vnto the Roman Consul; and receiuing his faith for security of the Town, presently presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is, that Hannibal men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and serue on the Roman side, it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, & returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman againe, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Pretors, an hundred & twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their seruice, vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods restored vnto them, when their citie should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campanians toward Rome, it serued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Contestines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yeelded themselves to Hannibal, returned againe to their old allegiance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himselfe a Capitaine, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in foraging the Countrey, was slain by Hanno; with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, to which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to passe: & being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligence, He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, vwho lay at Rome as Embassadour, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Citie. But he and his company were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, vwhere they suffered death as traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vsed much to goe forth of the towne on hunting by night; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not seeme to haue bene abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes iourney to Tarentum, if he should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place the lesse to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure. He caused it to be giuen out, that he was sicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne carelesse of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their businesse in order, He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot, and long before breake of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discovered. It had bene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times: Wherefore the Roman Gouvernour, when he heard tell in the euening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night, Hannibal guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arriuall, Nico, that was within the towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was ready: Presently Nico beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called vnto the Porter, bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heauy, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith forthwith burst two young men, laden with the Boares, which Hannibal had prepared before, to be worthy to look on. Which did the Porters good wondring at the largesse of the beast, & Philomenes ran a hunt through with his Boar, spurring him, and letting in some thirty armed men, fell vpon the watch, whom when he had slaine, he burst the great gate: so the Armie of Hannibal, entering the towne at two gates, went directly toward the Market place, vwhere both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and schoone into quarters within the Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commaunded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better perswasion in this case, Hannibal would the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in sight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare: All the towne was in uproare, how they would doe, what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskillfully sounded by a Greek the Theater: which helped the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, and the Romans, who were about to spoyle the Towne, and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in a commotion. The Gouvernour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Cittadell, that stood in the mouth of the Hauens; vwhence, he might easily be perceived on the morning, how the battle passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them no word of stand, what good affection he bore them; inuenged bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors, and spake vnto them, he thought fit for the present. This done, and having gotten what spoyle was to be had of the Souldiers goods, in the Towne, he aduanced himselfe against the Cittadell, hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them unable to defend the Place. According to his expectation it partly followed: for when he beganne to make his approaches, the Romans ana-bravely jalyng, & charging vpon him: who fell backe of purpose according to direction, richly had drawt on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst aduantage. Then Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely fasting vpon the backe, slaine him backe with great slaughter, as fast as he could turne; so that afterwards he durst not asse the forth. The Cittadell stood vpon a steepe hill, that was plaine ground, and fortified onely with a ditch and wall around the Towne, whereunto it was ioynd by a causeway. This causeway Hannibal intended to forsake in like sort against the Cittadell, to the end that the Tarentines might be able without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conueied hopes of winning the Place it selfe, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place: But whilst he was busied in his workes, there came by sea a strong supply from Metaportum: which took away all hope of preuailling, & made him returne to his former counsaile. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the Hauens, and could not passe forth, whilst the Romans held the Cittadell: it seemed likely, that the towne would suffer want, being debarted of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea: whilst the Roman garrison, by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconuenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the Hauens, to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer land, and to bring them into the Sea without. This he vnderooke, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity; though, with much patience it held out, and Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required. Thus with mutual losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growed daily stronger, & Ennius Fulvius, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastie growth from that want of men and of all necessities, wherinto the losse at Cannae had reduced them. But as fast as the Legions were raised, so fast they were sent to the field, that were vnder severall yeeres of age, and for the seeking out of such Lads as might be serviceable, and pressing them to the wars, making yet a Law, That their yeeres of seruice, wherinto they were bound, by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefite, from this their beginning to young, as if they had been of lawful age before.

Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campani felt great want of victualls, as if they had already been besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going ycers made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadours to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to be shortly. He gaue them comfortable words: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day, against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victualls, that he would prouide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantity of graine, that had been laid vp in Cities round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a few packe-horses, as if this had been enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesnesse of the Campani. Hanno was exceeding angry herat: and told them they were worse than very beasts, since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherefore he gaue them a longer day, against which he made prouision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum by night, where with diligence he made inquirie into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions, that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carts and other Varlers, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great haruest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves to assaile the Enemies campe: and leauing all his impediments within Beneuentum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, he had wel-neere forced the Campe on the sudden. But it was very strong and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Fulvius to lose more of his men in the attempt, seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke, to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie, and to lye betwene Hanno and home; that neither the Campani should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieue them. Being thus discouraging, and about to found the reitrait, hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart. There was great bootie, or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would indure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominy, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers aduenture so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiuing the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had already gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the Campe was wonne: in which were slaine aboue fixe thousand; and taken, aboue seuen thousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the neerer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that he was wont to protest vnto their Citie; and how he had made shew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gaue nor strong and speedy succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoile, whilest he himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adioyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt, were some of the Metapontines, and other cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Gracia. These people took to hart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would haue done the like, vpon the like reason, had not some companies lye in their Towne;

Towne;

Towne, which they feared that they should not be able to master. Neuertheless, they helped themselves by cunning: inuading to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand; against whom whilest they proffered their seruice to Hannibal, the Roman Capitaine, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A little formality they vsed in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans, in saying, Hannibal himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while, because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practice whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disposition lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in the rest, and deliuered vp the towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilest the Consuls fortifying Beneuentum to secure their backs, addressed themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late been twice Consul, was slaine, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans, to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneuentum, there to secure the backe of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death happened in an ill time, to the great hinderance of that busines. The Volones or Slaues, lately manumised, forsook their Ensignes, and went euery one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader, so that it asked some labour to seeke them out, and bring them backe into their camp. Neuertheless, the Consuls went forward with their work, and drawing neer to Capua, did all acts of hostility which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome, wherein aboue fifteene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere, Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better, inso much that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went seuerall waies: Fulvius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who hauing led him a great walke, fetcht a compassse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reiect the vertue of any good Souldier, how meane soeuer his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand: and he himselfe being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, between a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) slaine, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius, a Roman Pretor with eighteen thousand men, was in Apulia, very careless, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he hastened to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should haue cut off those forces, that lay in the Prouinces about, vnder men of small ability. Coming vpon Fulvius, he found him and his men so jolly, that needs they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battell to Fulvius, he soone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aliue, leauing all, saue two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, receiued the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuertheless, all care was taken, to gather vp the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sat down before the towne, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Army from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would issue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should

haue his pardon, and be suffered to inioy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contemptuously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian, which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long iourney, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium, vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words, and were with words bravely re-comforted. He bade them consider, how a few dayes since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither again, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get backe into the City, which the Romans had almost intrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very wel manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time, and therby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy, whilst the Roman Army spent ittselfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingred, and therby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, & to dispatch the election of new Magistrats in Rome; whilst he him selfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua, retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The townes-men often sallied out; rather in a brauery, than likelihood to vvorke any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan hoste (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirmiish. In these exercises the Campans vsually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy, who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some active and courageous yong men, should learne to ride behind the Roman men at armes, leaping vp, and against dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thicke vpon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galaria, fell vpon their Campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of vnseruiceable people on the wals, which with a loud noyse of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campans, easily defended his Trenches against them; & so well repressed them, that he draue them at length backe into their City. Neuertheless, in pursuing them to their gates, He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fulvius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian army. The Roman camp was euen at point to haue bin lost; and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three & thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch, & filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine wel, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That euery one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next hills, forasmuch as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Army, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched ittselfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome ittselfe: & now his desire of winning the Tarentine citadell, had wel-neer lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum, were to haue bin much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, euen to set vpon Rome; and carry to the wals of that proud City, the danger of waire that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces, then was it likely, that either he, or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despaire, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His onely feare was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and therupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtile Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman Camp, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The iourney to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddenesse of his arriuall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Vulturius. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate, which was therewith affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsell to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather than to put the towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondred how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence, if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behouefull: & if it might conueniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the city of Rome into much aduventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fifteen thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choise of his whole Army: with which he hastened toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not trauell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Vulturius, burnt vp all his boates; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hastened he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges ouer Liris broken down, by the people of Fregellæ: which as it stopped him a little on his vvay; so it made him the more grievously to spoyle their lands, vvholes the Bridges were in mending. The neerer that he drew to Rome, the greater wast he made: his Numidians running before him; driuing the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their own feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pestered with vvomen, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great market, or place of Assembly; ready to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrats. All places of most importance were stuffed vvith souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon vvhich part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came news that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hastening to the defence of the city. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by comming into the city in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should haue equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arriued at Rome, one soone after another: Fulvius hauing been long held occupied in passing ouer Vulturius; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrey was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater, so took they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio, or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way vnder the walls, viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. Above the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (upon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their service might be usefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal, bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproare, among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the walls. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cartell, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stoppt vp: and the poore Numidians pittifully beaten from the house toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not been certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedy the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented battle to the Romans, who did not wisely if they vndertook it. It is said, that a terrible shewre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their severall Camps: and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking vp & clearing as soone as they were departed asunder: certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not indure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well aduised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be giuen to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great soeuer it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time, the supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, was sent out of the town, & went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Punicke terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause knowne, or no cause answerable to the greatnes of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy to doe somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such as men haue fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they wist not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproare in his Army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had sent the Asse into the camp. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity: wherby they sustained their reputation, & augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to haue bin diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was solde in Rome: and sold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bin in time of peace. This indignity comming to his eare, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made port-sale of the Silver-smiths shoppes, which were neer about the Market or Common place in Rome, as if his owne title to the houses within the Town were no whit worse, than any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, vvhether he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing vorth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceiued; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed vnto himself, this iourney had brought forth none other, than the same of his much daring. Wherefore he brake vp his Campe: and doing what spoil he could in the Roman Territorie, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest ouer the Country, and ran toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrival was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gaue it lost, and is likely to haue cursed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that faire Citie, since he had no other way to vent his griefe.

Ennius returning backe to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that whoso would yeeld, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Ennius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, euery mans conscience of his owne euill deserts, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Belsar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to conuey such Letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was vndertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues, out of the Towne into the Roman camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned ere they could conueigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Towne; and the Letters of Belsar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement intreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium & Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoeuer they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Armie be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannæ. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate fall, if he would once more aduenture to set vpon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Belsar, and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now beganne to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hannibal and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had bin sent ouer by the Hannonians, to obserue the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were so, iustly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remedielesse necessitie. Howsoeuer it were, the Letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them backe into the Town. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Campans, so that the multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeers since had been most forward in ioyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruell reuenge, which the Enemies sought vpon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poison. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserued, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open, whereat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian garrison; & commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe: at their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons vpon them all; and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe custodie, some to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general multitude, they were referred vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vsed by Ennius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduersity. Ap. Glandius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately receiued; yet was he not inexorable to the Campans, as hauing loued them well in former times, & hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Paculus, of whom we spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hastie in taking vengeance: for feare, lest vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoufull to the common safety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, & from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods, after which he stricke off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all to wnes of Italy the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campan; & bred a general inclination, to return vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines, & Sabatines, people of the Campan, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare, & want of ability to resist. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their yong gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the city was like to haue bin consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no casualtie. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed vnto any slaue, and other sufficient reward to any free man, that should discover who those incendiaries were. Thus all came out, and the Campan being detected by a slaue of their own (to whom, about his liberty promised, was giuen about the sum of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more & more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a maner as prisoners within their wals: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poor women in Capua (of which once had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wiues and children sold for slaues, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserued to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day, and confined vnto seuerall places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the town of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious site: but no corporation or forme of politie, was allowed to be therein; onely a Roman Prouost was euery yeer sent to gouerne over those that should inhabit it, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being farre spent; and that which should haue reuiued his flame, being vnfortunately shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicill, held warre against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

W Hilst things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia & Sicill by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet & happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great & sudden: about thirty thousand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arriue there to suppress it. One Harsicoras with his son Hyosus, mighty men in that Island, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carelesse, as in the rest of their maine vndertakings, about the same time. Yet it had been better, if their care had bin directed vnto the prosecution of that maine businesse in Italy; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would haue sufficed, if they could haue hindered the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Harsicoras with his followers might well enough haue serued to driue out Quintus Mutius the Prætor: who lay sicke in the Province; and not more weake in his owne body, than in his traine. But whilst they sought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise enterprise was such; as may seeme to haue encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent ouer Asdrubal, surnamed, the Bold, with a competent fleet and armie, assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Marga a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremity of foule weather, was cast vpon the Baleares: so beaten and in such euill plight, that the Sardinians had euen spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arriue to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Island, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preferue and vp-hold in their seuerall Prouinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had bene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincials; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatsoeuer accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most readie and best approved means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very carefull intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwayes in readinesse fit men to reclaime their Subiects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harsicoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we haue spoken before: he landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrey, and sought out the Enemy. Hyosus, the sonne of Harsicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This young Gentleman would needs aduenture to get honour, by giuing battell to the Romans at his owne discretion. So he rashly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee received a terrible ouerthrow; and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyosus himselfe; with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeature came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as he might haue done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to saue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himselfe backe to Calaris: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance; their Countrey being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if hee had stayed a litle longer, Asdrubal would haue sought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appeares to haue bin greater than was their strength. For after some trial made of them in a few skirmishes, Manlius aduentured all to the hazzard of a battaile; wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians, three thousand. Foure houres the battell lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had bene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of yong Hyosus, and of his father Harsicoras, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuitie of Asdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in short space wonne the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded vnto the Roman; who imposing vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their seuerall offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome, leauing Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicill was of greater length, and euery way more burdnesome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not onely sauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enioyed before. Soone after after the battell of Cannæ, the old king of Syracuse died; who had continued long a steadfast friend vnto the Romans, and greatly relieued them in this present warre. He left his kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeeres of age; Gelo his sonne, that should haue bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his successour, Hiero appointed fifteene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius, who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he iudged most likely to preserue the kingdome, by the same art, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing wearie of so many coadiutors, began to commend the sufficiencie of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and said, that he was able to rule the kingdome without help of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to passe, in a sort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernment, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diadem with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby hee offended the eyes of his people, that had neuer scene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more hee offended them, when by his insolent behauiour, suitable to his outward pompe, he gaue prooffe, that in course of life, he would reuiue the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. He grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to liue in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoide the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe. Onely Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counsaillers, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoeuer they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about the maine point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thraso, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilst as yet it remained somewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his person, was detected by a Groome of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, vnto the extremitie of the torture; he confessed, that he had bene set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neere in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streetes, and neuer shrunke for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolved vpon siding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessitie, had of late been such, as might haue bene termed excessiue, were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein he tooke order for his owne Estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the young Nephew, taking little heed of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things present; the weaknesse of Rome, the preualent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betwene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him the order of the fight at Cannæ, that he might thereby learne how to accomodate himselfe, saying, That he could hardly beleue the Carthaginians;

so wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Hauing thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Domination; but afterward, that he should reigne ouer all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italy. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, than were enforced vpon them by necessitie; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had received such blemish; by that which hapned vnto him in his iourney, as much discountenanced him when hee came into Sicily, and forbade him to looke bigge. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carry backe vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But in stead of returning the money with thanks, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noised abroad that he should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (wherof we haue spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine-glorie, and send word after him, that he should conigne that money ouer to Marcus Valerius, of whose voyage into Grece, the City had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimitie, into such a pittifull tune of thanksgiuing, as must needs haue bred sorrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of pastime and scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilst Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resolved how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innoation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer, had it bene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom wee spake before, were sent about the Countrey with two thousand men, to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a City of his owne Dominion: hoping that the same of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators took him on the sudden as he was passing through a narrow street: and rushing betwene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the sound of that word so ioyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp, the Army, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carkasse to lie vnburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away; to signifie all that had passed, to stirre vp the people to libertie, and to preuent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowes would make offer to vsurpe a tyranny. The Syracusians hereupon presently tooke Armes, and made themselves masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island: being yet vncertaine what to doe; between desire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise mis-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that wel-knownne Prouerbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till hee were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horse-backe. But feare, and better counsaile prevailed so farre, that Andronodorus, hauing slept vpon the matter, dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope vnto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the people: telling them, that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, lest they would not haue contained themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather haue sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer, he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered vp the charge committed vnto him, by one that had bin an euill euill master both to him and them. Hereupon great ioy was made, and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraigntie, and so vehement were the instigations of his wife, that shortly he began to practise with Hippocrates, Epicles, and other Capitaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himselfe strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicles had bene with the Syracusan Pretors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they, according to instructions of their Capitaine, had done him, whilest he liued, what seruice they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed; and with a conuoy, that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusan Magistrates were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Scicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindefull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosomes of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitiues, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themislius, that had married Harmania the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themislius, entring into the Senate, were slaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilest Hieronymus liued, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessory to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recouered those royall ornaments and Soueraigne power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero & Gelo were also condemned to die; and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demarata and Harmania had perhaps deserued this heauy sentence: but Heracles, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sesippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash iudgement. Her husband Sesippus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to king Ptolomie, &c. he durst not returne home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude, that (pardoning themselves) all cried out vpon the authors of so foule a butcherie. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger, they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themislius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not onely of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicles Pretor, another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betwene the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing struen in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, so that was lately come into Sicil, they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garriſon; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended by such fugitiues, & mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly & boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the the league; & that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicles fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward this warre, than to excuse any breach of peace, went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebel against the Syracusians. For he said; that since they had all of late serued one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be disfranchised by his death; as well as the Syracusians; yet of much rather, all things considered, siued in their Armes the Tyrant was slain; and liberty first prebelymed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enioy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion over those that had broken the Chaine, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his aduice was, that such their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it should get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one Article of the League, made of late by the Romans & Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had bene subiect to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be vsall vnto the State of Syracuse. Against this Article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicles told them; that in this notable change, they had fit oportunitie to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, whilst this crafty Catthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had bene subdued by the same hand, which tooke liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded vnto Syracuse, and bene subiect vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable, than iust. Nevertheless, the motion of Epicles was highly approved: in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines; for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicles, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed; so that they stayed not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans; nor thought themselves bound to obserue the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicles fled; and stealing thence away by night, conueyed themselves into the towne of Herbesus. The first thing which Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same; which other Roman Capitains vsed after victory, to seek out the fugitive Roman slaues and renegados, whom he caused all to die: therest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy; forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary sort. It was said, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Childe, and plit the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusan Army vpon the way; as it was going to ioyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were; that had bene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Soss and Dionomus; two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other rebels. These Capitaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrey: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those discasles, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had bene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and let them worke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their fortities. So towards Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicles, the architects of all this mischief; deuising what further harme they might doe; but how so weakly accompanied, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore returned vpon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with Olive branches in their hands; in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Cret were in the Vanguard, that that had bene well vsed by Hieronymus, and some of them greatly bound vnto Him-bal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and loquingly dismissed them.

 These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheere, saying, That no man should doe them harme, as longes they could vse their weapons.
 Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by severity, which would not serue. For when they commanded these two traitors to be layd in Irons; the exclamation was so violent against them, that saine they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a trick, where by to help himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused Letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusan Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were,
 That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines; but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeited Epistle was openly rehearsed, they proore was such, that Sosis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the Campe, and sic for their liues. All the Syracusians remaining behinde, had bene cut in peeces by the en-ragged souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued amongst the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnes. This incensed not onely the multitude; but some of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (saide some) was the auarice and cruelty of the Romans detected; who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might haue bene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilest they were thus discouraging, and deuising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizen to let him in, vnlesse for want of helpe, they would betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would saue haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the towne, that laboured to breake it open. So he entered, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day hee went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty vnto all slaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he neere with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, Their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enioy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might bee deliuered vp. Hereto Epicles briefly answered, That if their errand had bene to him, hee could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to retorne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernment in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned, he told them, they should finde by experience, That to besiege Syracuse, was another manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them gone, and returned backe into the City. Immediately began the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of wals as compassed Syracuse, being manned with with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neuertheless all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailling by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastie victorie. But there lined at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of Warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could haue bene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne powder; had they in that age bene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remooue the whole earth out of the place wherein it is; if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For prooue of this bold assertion; he performed some strange workes, which made the King entreat him to conuict his studie vnto things of vse: that might preferue the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an iniury done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workmanship, and gaine, of base handi-crafts men.

 And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed vnto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath bene the vnhappy fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as falling within compasse of the meanest wit, and things that euery one could well haue performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he vnder-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparant prooue. He that looks vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuentors any whit the lesse, for that the labour of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may bee said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wisemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheape rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankind; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of iniustice, that the long trauels of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in ieany thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such ease as this; and fighteth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath benefited him. Neuertheless, if we haue regard vnto common charite, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine vpon the iust, and vniust: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not amixed to it some dangerous cunning, that may bee peruerted by euill ment to a mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Art, or contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecoverable poyson: much better it were, that such a iewel remaine close in the hands of a wise and honest man, than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended vnto very commendable ends. They were Engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse: not for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he together publish the knowledge, how to vse them; but referred so much to his owne direction;

direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approued vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit to his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these Archimedes had sundrie deuices, of which any one sort might haue repelled the assaylants: but all of them together shewed the multiplictie of his great wit. He shot heavy stones & long pieces of timber, like vnto the yeards of ships, which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoysted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted vp into the ayre, where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls or cast vpon the rockes: and all of them were so beaten that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In the like sort was the Land armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like hailes, did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engines of batterry; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assault. For remedie hercof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could early before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blanche, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woound vp hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaylants liues: For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to tarry by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare, against the cause whercof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; hee might haue holpen it, by some deuice, to make them vsueruiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls, where Archimedes gaue directions how to vse them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate peece of worke. For the enemies hauing so goodly an Haven, the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likelie so soone to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, hauing no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so deakt with the Senate, that sixe and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicily by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He tooke Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sacke it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrirentum: whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned backetoward Syracuse, carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumstance, that he vsed, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foote, and sixe hundred horse, horse, intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the disperfed and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation hercof helped a litle to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, charged with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Campe: yet many places reuolted vnto the Carthaginians, and flew or betrayed the Romane Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intenuie to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrirentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation; if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to preuaile: & he himself was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not feasible, an enterprize that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no like lihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assaied to preuaile by treason, against w^{ch} no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his Campe, exhorting them to praefise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the Town would hearken to no parlee. At length a flauie vnto one of these banished men; making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse, where hee talked in priuate with some few, as hee had beene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vsed to send him aduertisements of their proceedings, by a filher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Laodemonian, that had beene sent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epistides was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose; not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometrie, fell to numbering the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, iudged it lesse than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakest part of the Town; and therefore the most strongly guarded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprize. But a fugitiue out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three daies: and that, because other good cheate was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epistides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not be wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festiuall night, came vnto the walls, which he took by Scaulo. Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or sixe, if Epipola were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina & the Island, as of those in the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of these parts, which the Romans had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those that were sheltered vnder strong Houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnfurnished of his helpes, since they held out a good while; and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegado's, were more careful than ever to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the olde Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicles sallied out of Acradinia vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assailants were repelled. Neuerthelesse, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as straightly besieged, as hee himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to doe his Countrie service; but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid, being loth to double the Cape, for that the windes did better serue the enemy than him. Thither sailed Epicles out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citie, and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, hee stood off into the deepe, and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicill farewell. Then durst not Epicles returne into Syracuse, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the issue, with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian souldiers that remained aloue of Hippocrates his Army, lay as nere as they could safely, vnto Marcellus, and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicill was giuen as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace, and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne. Heereunto Marcellus willingly gaue ear: for hee had staid there long enough; and had cause to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enioying their libertie and proper lawes; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicles had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates euen ready to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercenarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betrayed the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke Armes, and fell vpon the new chosen Pretors; whom they slue, and made election of sixe Captaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers, excepting onely the fugitives. The Treatie was therefore againe set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delaied; either by some feare of the Citizens, that had seene (as they thought) prooffe of the Roman avarice in the sack of Epipola, Tybe, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vse the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subiect to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the sixe Captaines, that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of such faith, as vsually is found in Mercenaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: hauing a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligones, that went in company with the Romane Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This craftie Agent perswaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spaine: and that if euer he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where else; it was now the onely time to do it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanishe Captaine was easily wonne, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards, thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had bene such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Army of Mercenaries, should minister

vnto the people of Rome, aduantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeld vnto the time; and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicles: it had bene their chiefe care to maintain amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicles his followers; and many of themselves had also bene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascallie, and some ill aduised persons, ioyned with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and after ward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Romane Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargaine vnder hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, & promise of good vsage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and giue over the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthy strong, and many wayes important. Neuerthelesse if we consider the many inconueniences and great mischiefs whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by euill neighbours; and by that very forme of policie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly affirme, That it receiued no small benefit, by becoming subiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not onely assured against all forraigne enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of olde had reigned therein: but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most worthie Citizens, as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the ialousie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enioyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues not to make iniustice the more excusable: vnlesse we should approue the answer of that Thiefe; who being found to haue stolen a siluer cup from a sicke man, said, Hee may leaue drinking.

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse; wherein the booty that it found, was said to haue bin no lesse, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was maruellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; saue onely the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicles, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents, the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that hee harkened not to the noyse, and vprore in the Citie; no; nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder & a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which hee first found out. An Inuention of so little vse, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artist better, than the deuising of all those engins, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would thinke the monie lost, that had bin spent vpon a sonne, whose studies in the Vniuersitie had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicill yelded vnto the Romans, except Agrigentum and a few places therabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicles with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good peeces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicles aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and drove them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in Epicles and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that that hauing beene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that hee had sent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, & to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside vnto Heraclea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemy, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farre greater were the odds betweene the Captaines. For howsoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceived some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious enuy of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countreman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but onely looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did lustily set vpon the enemies, that hee brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them backe into Agigentum.

If Hanno could haue beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of Warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without need, the Romans would shortly haue beene reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leaue the Prouince; and soone vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew manie of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Cannae, tooke it very hainously, that no good seruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, & not suffered to return back to Rome with their general. Mutines had pacified his Countreman the Numidians; & like an honest man, did what hee could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue beene, if the Armie lately ouerthrowne had beene entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his owne men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. Hee recovered those In-land Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Country, yet hee hindered the Country from reuolting vnto Mutines. About threescore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which Agigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as hee pleased, in despite of the Romans: not onely to the succour of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. Hee had (belike) receiued instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honour of these Sicilian Warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should haue beene regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: He tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spightfull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countreman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Leuius, the Roman Consull, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these these indignities; but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauored by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countreman had lately done, content himselfe to see his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part, but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agigentum, and to helpe to expell them vterly out of Sicil. The Consull was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noyse, thought it had beene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians; as he had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and sauing himselfe, with Epicides, in a smal Barke, set saile for Africke; leaving all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans; that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Leuius the Consull hauing taken Agigentum, did sharpe execution of iustice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time; wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessity of gold, than of Steele: which may haue beene the reason, why Leuius dealt so cruelly with the Agigentines. Neuertheless the fame of such seueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yielded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twenty were deliuered vpon Treason, and sixe onely stayed to be wonne by force. These things done, Leuius returned home to Rome; carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agirina; that were a companie of out-lawes, bankrots, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoyle of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their owne occupation against the Brutians; a theuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipios in their iourne against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall seruice. So by this enterprize of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue beene employed in Italie: leaving yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and Hannibal in Italie, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metaurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicil, he had granted vnto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Prouince. He staid not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consull together with M. Valerius Leuius, who succeeded him in the gouernment of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consull Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consull, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to be moane themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto the the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controuersie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subiection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath beene shewed before. The two new Consuls Marcellus and Lauius, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie, the other in Sicil. The Isle of Sicil fell vnto Marcellus; which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindered by feare, from vttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his businesse with them was dispatcht, he gently vnderooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countie in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicil, whose doings there haue beene already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the warre, and most of all, with getting Marriners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer sort, that vsed to be employed in Sea-seruices; especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to giue them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of priuate men, who in this necessitie of the State, were driuen to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremitie. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could vndergoe; and somewhat more, than could with honesty haue beene imposed vpon it. Neuertheless it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasurie was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no perswasions would be so effectually with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the people also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the mony that he had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoeuer; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankefully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publike necessitie could no otherwise be holpen, euery one was contented, that his priuate estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it suffered wracke, in vaine could any particular man hope to enioy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deferred well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conuenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie against Hannibal; and Lauius toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard seruice: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the losse of Capua; which gaue them cause, to looke vnto themselves, as if in his helpe there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in neede. This he well perceiued, yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must haue Garrisons into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his armie, that he should not be able to keepe the field: or else he must leaue them to their owne fidelity, which now began to wauer. At length his ialousie grew so outrageous, that he sacked, and wasted, those places that he was vnable to defend, thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe, and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before hee had least cause to doubt. The towne of Salapia yeelded vnto Marcellus; and betrayed vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that serued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, than the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect, without getting the consent of one Dafius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafius in priuate, and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuicted and charged of Treason, hee so stoutly denied it, and by way of rectification, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuised out of meere malice, knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any prooffe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduersarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such liuely reasons, that he who could not be beleued by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the fauour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul tooke by force, Maronea and Meles, Townes of the Samnites, where he slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once; but was faine to catch aduantages, where hee might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themselves with ill speede in many petty enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italie, to follow businesse of far lesse importance, had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had beene so long promised & expected. This if they had done in better season, Rome it selfe might haue beene stricken downe, the next yeere after that great blow receiued at Canna. But since that which is past cannot be amended, Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie succour would come time enough. For Masanissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spaine: whither when he came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his iourne into Italie, of which there had beene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal, and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best; the Romans to preuent the threatening mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Pretor, lay nere vnto Herdonia to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, since, nere vnto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his Armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; & came to Herdonia ere Fulvius heard newes of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor, who accepted it with more haste than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himselfe, with twelue Tribunes or Cromels, were lost: of the common Souldiers, that were slaine, the number is vncertaine; some reporting feuen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonia, because it was at point to haue yeelded vnto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire; and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude, whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheere; for that hee would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouertaking him at Numistro in the Countie of the Lucans, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clocke in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darkenesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often, and sought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and vpon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, hee that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Romans affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne, like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that serued vnder him the yeere before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe

Tarentum.

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannus, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunity of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignity of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to be at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile, wherein Hannibal had the victory; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pefants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the fitt of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stratagemes. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did so vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall, they besought him to pardon them; and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; whereof the newes might beat Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight againe; since all other motiues continued the same, and his men had beene hartned by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late Carthaginian ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal, who dislodged by night. Neuertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Fulvius the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucanis, and Vulscantes, that willingly yeilded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fulvius encertained in louing sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had beene authours, or busied in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theues, which Lucius had lately brought from Asuterna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, fate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine which; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, she gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side: by telling him how rich; and of what great accompt her lover was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistis, to doe what she would haue him. The Consul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitive, and try what good might be done: It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perswasions; partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister, willed him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolved how to order it, the same Souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that that Brutian kept watch; and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate, whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vsed now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of hospitality that had passed betwene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue beene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone; and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and positure as if they were fighting, he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yeilded. When this businesse was done, he hastened away to relieue Tarentum. But when he came within fiew miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans haue also their Hannibal; we haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul, he incamped a few dayes together, so neere as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgieue them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote backe by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the iourney to Metapontum was deterred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discovered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euery where; saue onely at Caulonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so beene rid of them. But their common poverity, & disability to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirry Roman Colonies were then in Italie; of which, twelue refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered, that the Legions of Cannus, and those vnhappy Companies that had beene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicily; where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon vpon the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhausted with leuiies of men, and impositions of money: in euery of which yeeres they had received some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer returned. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrinum, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly deny vnto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campans or Tarentines, but the offspring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eightene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselves willing to vndergoe whatsoeuer should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls, that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commendation of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute, it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill deservings.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priuie treasure; and thence take out the gold that had been layed vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money, finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the iourney of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere, & the next were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driven to furnish the Armie in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was far lesse than fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Liuie rather inclines to those, who say, that he got it soone after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In the first yeere it was, that Asdrubal took his iourney out of Spain, though he came not into Italy vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Cume and Nepes, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haue, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italy; where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had beene ready to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later than had beene expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countreies his brother was to passe; that therein he might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from harkning to to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouerty of the Romans, & the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming, than that which Hannibal brought into Italy, did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aruntines, to take such counsell as they thoughtmost expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeere following they were deuising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terrour of seuerer iudgements & inquisitions, and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wils; and took many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of engines, sending for a fleet out of Sicily to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the city: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprize, & retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no need to stand vpon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather dected as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, & fought to take them at some aduantage; reseruing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, wherinto the Romans fell: and hauing lost about three thousand of their company, were wellglad the rest of them, to quit their enterprize, and saue their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no aduantage. There lay betweene him and them an Hillocke, ouer-growne with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndiscerned, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselves close, and attend their best aduantage. To this piece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remoue their campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neere enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gaue warning of their approach to his fellows; who discouered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls & their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieued from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weake assistance of no more than forty horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began euery one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe. The rest of the Colonels and Officers; together with the Liſtors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slaine or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, couered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus to be by him interred, where he thought good,

Presently

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was false into the custody of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore he sent word vnto all the Towns about, that his Colleague was slaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needfull. The deuise was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the reuengefull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein bene betrayed. The Salapians herupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gate: for the Consul was there. The gate was opened faire and leisuredly, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselves; being laide at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Locri; where vnto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantecurors, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their ships: leauing all their engines, and what focuer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, & requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Common-wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so neere vnto the enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staied wit. The fathers therefore endeauoured to ioine vnto him in the Consulship M. Livius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Livius had bene Consul with L. Emilius Paulus, in the yeere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good seruice, they had both of them bene called into iudgement by the People: and this Livius condemned; Emilius hardly escaping. Though it hath bene once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honorable men. For in the battaile of Cannæ, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Emilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Livius, hee is euen now ready, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had he bene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countie Grange; still vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lauinius, being Consuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued priuate in discontented sort, as might appeare, both both by his carelesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire & beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vsed to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was proposed, either in short formall words; or in passing from side to side, when the house was diuided. At length it hapned, that in some businesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman; he stood vp, & made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was; and what he had bene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather serued to fill vp the number, than to answer to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had euen spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to say; that it was great pittie, so worthy and able a man, as this Livius, had bene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth stood in great need, yet had not vsed in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Laminius, being both of them Patricians, could be ioined with Claudius Nero: euerie one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two sifter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livius would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrascs he resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested iniuries done by the People, and repaid good for euill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men breake in faire weater; but run vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulness, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the second King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alua. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, vpon some small offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the seruice of a man, more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisdom often taught by necessitie.

It was a dangerous yeere toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to haue the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans vsed at this time the seruice of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leaue and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure serued in Spaine, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italy, where need seemed to require; that onely two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution: and would not be tied to the partiall obseruance of what the Senatethought fit. M. Livius would not stire out of Rome; against so mighty a power as followed Asdrubal, vntill he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could wel be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true; that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeer, among the Cisalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom the warre against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentines; neere vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie, that was sent against Hannibal. Neither the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Livius, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was already passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrey about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to ioine with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would aduenture no further, than hee safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each his severall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwife affected, affected, than they had beene, when L. Emilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they stood in feare, lest all diligence, wisdom and valour should proue too little. For since few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not beene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreame difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Cannæ: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the war in Italy. But there was now arriued another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riuers and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne, like a pensive traine of Mourners: so thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispinus, vpon whom in the like sort they had giuen attendance the last yeere; but saw neither of them returne aliue, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Livius, that hee should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victory; or by seeing the ouerthrow of his owne vniust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the ioy of a gear, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the ouerthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spaine by Scipio, a little before he tooke his iourney into Italy, such mention hath already beene made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Livie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Capitaines that were sent from the city of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the aduantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courtes vndertaken, it cannot be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicily with Mutines, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needefull, by these mischieuous Partizans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuerthelesse Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could nor long digest. His iourney into Italy being required vpon: hee lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the Mines of silver; whence he was to furnish his expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though hee were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Capitaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue beene so great, as it must haue beene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his mony, with his Elephants before him: but staid behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retyred in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the

the sonne of Gescio; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio haue stopped him on his iourney, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Asdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his mony, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countrey, whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iourney ouer the Alpes, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauielled through their Countrey. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily persuaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattail; and to make spoyle of that little wealth, which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in proceesse of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mighty Cities, farre disioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alpes did onely lye in the way: they gladly descended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also ioyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Etrurians haue done; if he had arriued in their Countrey. There was no other Roman Armie neere, than L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprife: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him, and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so umely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintering campes, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginians; & had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Abulians, into the countrey of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the iourney intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuerthelesse he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driuen to returne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assailed againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Aufidus to Canusium, where he fate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrey very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouercome the way to Canusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Countrey. If this had so falne out; Rome would haue beene vndone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to wish any second victory, in the naked Campes about Cannæ; if such an Armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beate him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilst Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of

Asdrubal

Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted; as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew on-wards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Linie the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioyned as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that howe soeuer the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonels had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adu-¹⁰enture, than to suffer the coniunction of two such malenolent Planets: whose pestilent in-¹⁰fluence, if not on the sudden, yet within few yeeres, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tye himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger: Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian bre-¹⁰thren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thou-¹⁰sand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choyce of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would onely step aside, to doe some small piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which hee was to passe, that they should bee ready to meet him, with victuals, and all other necessities for his Armie. Linus the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe dayes Nero had finished his journey thither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his comming. Linie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemie, perceiuing this acceffe of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done: and a token ³⁰ giuen, that the Colonels, Captaines, and all Souldiers, as well horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; should be lodged and entertained by men of their owne sort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that ioyned with them on the way. Neuertheless, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which received them, should bee enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few dayes after their weary iour-⁴⁰nic, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The Soul-⁴⁰diers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiuing that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene vndertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Ge-⁵⁰nerals pavilion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long de-⁵⁰sired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iourney. Hereupon he began to with-draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gaue order, that if no pri-⁵⁰soners could be taken, by whom hee might be certified of the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The camp, as hath beene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded onely once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the the quarter of Linus the Consul. Hee at Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well ac-¹⁰quainted with the Roman orders, held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, Asdrubal was alie, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke, till he might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neere he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly for-¹⁰tifying his owne Campe. Yet when he now perceiued, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remoue a little further off. So hee dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the Riuer Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessity of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heavy, and hindred his speed: farre he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Ro-¹⁰man horse, and staied him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe overtaken with necessity to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemie should not, with-¹⁰out much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe with his A-¹⁰fricans & Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants, he bestow-¹⁰ed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Linus of the left, and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was vnto the vanquished. Onely the Romans herein seemed to haue had the better in conceit, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to haue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Linus the Consul with a proud brauery, to giue charge on the Africans, by whom he was so sharply entertained; that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldi-¹⁰ers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a ¹⁰hardy Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Linus therefore, and Porcius, found strong ¹⁰opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ¹⁰ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules, that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the ¹⁰more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiuing that the place wherein he stood, was such as would com-¹⁰pell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his forces, and led them round behind the forces of Porcius and Linus: vvith hauing compassed, he fell ¹⁰vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here began the victory to bee mani-¹⁰fest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ran all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the En-¹⁰mies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on-¹⁰every side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken alieue: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies vvapons, others by their owne guides that rode ¹⁰them. For vvhen any of them, being sore wounded, began to vvaxe vvnruly, and rush ¹⁰back vpon their own battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke between the eares, in the ioynt of the neck, ¹⁰next vnto the head; wherewith he killed the beast vpon the sudden. This speedy way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squad-¹⁰rons following them; is said to haue been the deuice of Asdrubal himselfe, vvho dyed in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Linie. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother: to haue striven with great patience, against many difficulties; whereinto hee fell.

fell by the meanes of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall, and finally when he saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where, fighting brauely, he was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Linie, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Linie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an ouerthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Cannæ; that fittie fixe thousand of them were slaine, fise thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and about foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not onely in other kindes, but in gold and siluer. Concerning the bootie, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to haue been as rich as Linie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well-stored with money. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a parallel vnto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to haue bin slaine. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken aliue; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Wherby it may seeme that they were all Barchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves; and of their country, aboue their liues.

The ioy of this victory was no lesse in Rome, than had been the feare of the euent. For euer since it was knowne in what fort Nero had left his Army; the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his comming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consull should make such a great aduerture, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Army that staid behinde, much weakened, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke; yet reseruing their censure vnto the successe; with liberty to approue or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane time the people filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting stil ready at hand vpon the Magistrates, as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would aske euery ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleue it. Afterwards when Messengers arriued from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed: there was not onely great and ioyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their priuate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italy.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of the misaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generals, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howfocuer the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Common-weale: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolency of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deep impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselfe, being ouer-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperity. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks; Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, with-drew himselfe into the Countrey of the Brutians: and thither he caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compasse in the vtmost corner of Italy; it being a country of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vnited; or because it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans & Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harvest was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Linus the other Consull taried among the Cisalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer; there to set things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Prouince, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leaue to returne home; and that he might bring his Army vvith him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as he well deserued. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victory: order was giuen, that not onely Linie with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero, though leauing his Armie behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Linie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse-backe, and without such attendace, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers, by whom, the victory vvvas in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Caecilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgment of their good seruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the yeer following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this yeer, which vvvas the thirteenth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; saue only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surprize. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceiued of him, that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alonethey thought there was force enough to hold himselfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius, vvhom Linie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, he obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of so many sundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greeks; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they neuer fell to sedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Linie addes herto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leaue him, vntill he be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Mago and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, took vpon them the charge of Spain, when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Balears; there to leuie a supply of men;

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himself into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) vvhither the Romans had ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soon ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: vvhether he met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately bin employed in Sicily) who brought new forces out of Africke, & came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not vnlike-ly that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of Amilcar, vvhose authority had been great-est, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriours; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the country of the Celtiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by mony, and other persuasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: atten-tiue, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Italy; to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Luinius the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitiue Celti-berians, who became his guides, that their Countreimen incamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neer to these Celtiberians: & falling vpon them on the sudden, gaue them such an ouerthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their succour, in stead of heartening & re-inforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Mago saued himselfe with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies iourney brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celti-berians, they knew better how to make shift; and saued most of themselves by running into the vvoods.

It could no other wise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy stood, by the coming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteen hun-dred horse he did therefore send out of Spain (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countreie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon re-mained at new Carthage, intentiue to the necessity and successe of his Countreimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long be-fore the end of the Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the intire conquest of Spain, which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued vnder Hannibal, and those that had bin sent ouer into Africke, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noysed abroad, That all which had followed Asdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Army was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italy, which gaue such confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, because he took not this great enterprize in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore vsed the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindred the Enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio took by assault the Towne of Oringis.

Against the next yeers danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost, nor trauaile, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With sixtiety thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I beleeue, that he could hardly haue raised, without boldly deny-ing the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore he iudged it needfull to vse the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast a-way by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtfully of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one Celcher, that was Lord of eight and twenty towns, had promised him the last Winter; to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his seruice: he resolved to make vse of those, and some few others, that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not be able to doe any great harme, if they would reuolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemy, neer vnto whom: he incamped. At his first coming, Mago and Masaniissa fell vpon him; vvhith hope to take him vnprepared, whilest he was making his lodgings. But he layde certain troupes of horse in couert: which breaking vpon them v unexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly be-tookethemselues to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmi-shes between the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Asdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any far-ther. Thus they continued many daies: Asdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the euening, withdrew himselfe into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies long before designed. But Scipio when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He caused his men and horses, to be well fedde betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traîne out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: vsing herein the same trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertaine the Romans; whilest he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which hee encamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not bee discerned which part had the better: since being ouer-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat vnto their foote; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, hauing well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the Enemy. But about noone he caused his wings to aduance a good pace; leauing their battaile of Spaniards far behinde them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, saue only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in haste; and fighting onely in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose, they were forely pressed; and with much difficultie made resi-stance. The Carthaginians would faine haue succoured them; but that they durst not stir out of their places, because of the Spanish battell which was coming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Armie stood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduented to meet with the Spaniards, hee must haue cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betweene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when hee had arriued, he should haue found himselfe in-closed in such sort, as was the Consull Paulus at the battaile of Cannæ. Wherefore he did onely imploy his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chased with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In pro-cess of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lustie; when the others began to faint with trauell and heate of the day.

Where-

Wherefore perceiuing their aduantage, they followed it the more hotly : and gaue not ouer, till they had forc't the enemy to change his pace, and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderly retrait ; and after ward againe, to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victory to be so extorted from them : neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished, ledde by the obstinate passion of feare, which hearkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day beene taken ; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the sudden, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men : but caused them, hungry, and ouer-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe, wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he haue in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanisb Souldiers. One Atanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subiects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yielded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleue the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiuing this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away faster than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, & ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seuen thousand that with Asdrubal himselfe recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessities to sustain himself long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one ; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence ; he tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Sylla with ten thousand foot, & a thousand horse, to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masanissa staid in it) whilst he with the rest of the Armie did what was needfull in the Countrey abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masanissa followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it selfe ; some flying ouer to the Romans, others taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were onely three Towns left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of warre against the Romans: of which onely Castulo had a Carthaginian garrison, consisting of such as had saued themselves by flight in the late ouerthrows. Hereby it seems, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yielded long since vnto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that citie. For this was one of the last three towns that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes been inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune, it not onely rebelled, but with great cruelty betraied and slue, the poor men that escaped thither from the ouerthrows. Astapa was a town that still adhered to the Carthaginians ; and, which was worse, had thriven by the spoyle of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeer) Scipio went against these, and took himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcins ; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: wherinto was throwne all the gold, and siluer, with whatsoeuer else was precious; the women and children standing by it vnder a sure guard, that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being made, all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman camp; where struing beyond their power, they were euery one slaiue. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it : & many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilst they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seuen Gallies; leauing Mago behind him, to wait vpon occasion, occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax, king of the Massili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the kings Port: who landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith bethinke himselfe, how to finish the war, by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hereunto it seemed that the help of Syphax would be much auailable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also bin beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him ouer a Captaine into Africk; vvhich instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as hetherby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the citie in time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceiued hope of laying a good foundation to the vvar, which he intended in Africk; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lelius his Embassador, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, easily perswaded the king to take part with those that had the better, and vvere without question his better friends. Onely Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he tooke Sea: and arriued in the kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would haue been very dangerous to him, had he been descried by his enemies further at Sea : but in the Haven they forbore to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud, seeing at one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull cities, came to desire his friendship. He would haue brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by vwant of such Commission from the Senate. He feasted them together : and shortly dismised Scipio, with whom he readily entred into Couenant ; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

¶ II.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell betweene two Spanisb Princes. A digression, concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath been said before. The Conquest of the Countrey being then in a manner at an end, he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharp, according to the maner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vsed in the citie of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselves as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to giue prooffe in single combat, of the valour that was in their feuerall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not other wise end, agreed to refer the decision of their Controuersies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orsua, Cosen-germans: that contended for the principalltie of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the maner of our Irish Tanistry. But the father of Orsua stood lately seized of the Principality: which though himselfe receiued by the death of his elder brother; yet this his sonne would not let it goe backe, but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, & old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell, and that neither God, nor Man, but onely Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills : and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the yonger.

Such combats haue bene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betwene Paris and Menelaus; the other, between Hector and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that between David and Goliath; and others performed by some of Dauids Worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betwene twelue of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren Curatii that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmond Ironside, and Cannus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdom. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times, almost vpon euery occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Blois contending for the Duchie of Britain; there was a fight, for honor of the Nations, between thirty of the Britons, & thirty English: two of which English, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them haue been combats of brauery, and of gayeté de cœur, as the French terme it; for honour of seuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or whatsoeuer else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life, or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of Right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake euen now, betwene Corbis and Orsua. Vnto these (me thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that between David and Goliath, or that between the Horatii and Curatii: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was accustomed appointed between the Lord Henrie of Boulinbrook Duke of Hereford, & Monbray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ansley and one Cattrington: whom Ansley charged with treason: and proued it vpon him by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mountfort, and Henrie of Essex. The like also, between a Nauarrois, & one Welsh of Grimsby, whom the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him, and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if hee bee vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had bene due to the offender, if the accusation had bene proued; I cannot affirme. But wee euery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customs of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be overcome, hee shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Lowe, or offered to doe, in the reigne of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, hee that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauery, but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings six pence; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vse when as any man hath had an hard and vniust iudgement, saying, That he was tried by the Law of Loray, or Berne; ou le battin paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battell, that great learned man Thomas Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, & specially against the French Church: in which appears by his letters, to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Robert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the iudgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. Bare his liberty and kinde of triall, was retrancht by S. Lome, and Philip the king; so that no man could decree, or grant it, saue the king himselfe. It hath since been granted; though more sparingly, by the French kings, as to the Lord of Carouges against Jaques le Gris, and to Isolan Kowrathe Spaniard, against Moro, his countiman: wherein Sir Henry Kouquer, Father of the Lord Knolles now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death (and in those onely) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces deffences per uue dementir; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giuing the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did satisfielement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French king; vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combat; euery petty Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giuing of the Lie moralitic it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glory, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the fift had patiently indured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obiection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duels, as are founded vpon meere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats, the giuing of the Lie, which ought to bee the Negation onely in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so vnparadonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that giues it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their king, is growne to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kind of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no lesse ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a flane, the other, to a Souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though for my owne part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiuing it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them, vse nothing so much in their conuersation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsely. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & sworn to pay the monies & other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them that are not Liers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Iustice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth, hath directly lyed to him, to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of loue that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice, and of all they haue, vsed in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid but good morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wise French-man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Country) une marche & complos fait ensemble se macquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; A kinde of merchandis, and complos made among them, to mocke, belye, and deride each other: and so surre now-a-daies in fashion, and in vse, as he that vseth it not, is accounted either

dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are sometime perfwaded by necessity vpon breach of promises, and those which men vse out of cowardise & feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subiect of all our deadly quarrels in effect: to it I say, That whosoever giueth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied; doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, hee hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing; tells him, to whom he hath promised, that he will performe it; and, in not performing it, hee hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when he himselfe knowes to that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not lied; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine; and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Lifegiueth it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extreame rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an vntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vntruth is vttered:) but all that is rude, ought not to bee ciuillized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, that these discourses fauour of cowardize. It is true, if you call it cowardize to feare God or hell: whereas he that is truly wife, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall finde ten thousand feuen-penie-men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance lesse, than any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo, Fortitude is a diligent preseruer of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie betweene doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pona: sic nec fortem pugnā, sed causā, As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as hee may iustly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe we indeed take our owne reuenge, or punish the iniuries offered vs, by the death of the iniurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death vpon our owne consciences; Animasq; in vulnera pene-re, And to drowne our soules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne, in generous and noble spirits, the defence of their honors, being prest with iniuries? I say that I doe not, if the iniuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe fauour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the assailant. You will secondly aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honor to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer, that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can iudge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-man giues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror, and the Lawes of God appointed the Deuill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, & a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the kings of England & other Christian kings, haue seldome taken any such aduantage ouer men of quality, who vpon euen termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble-men & Gentlemen in former ages, in all important iniuries, sue vnto the king, to approue themselves by battaile and publike combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law; so did they disdain to submit themselves vnto the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Theeues:

Nay

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders: Yet is not the Manslaier freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require iustice by Grand Assize, or by battaile, vpon his appeal, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I vse his owne words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-slaier) be conuicted either by great Assize or by Battaille, vpon that appeal, the Man-slaier shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentle-men shall be repaired in honour, where an enemy taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamy vnseparable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if we hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, & Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wiues, & children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may be felony, to take by violence euenthat which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues vnto the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may bee murder? But yet againe it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to bee much more fearefull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of history, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike good? In these he that is imployed and trusted, if hee faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection, it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a priuate combat, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a friuolous one, is not an action of vertue, because it is contrary to the law of God, and of all Christian kings: neither is it difficult, because euen & equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrary; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue euery mans fame & reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine iniury by words, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any euill words that wee haue giuen, and to confesse that we haue done him wrong vnto whom we haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that giues ill words in choler, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduisement, hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be giuen but to those that are feruile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsier de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sate: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to vse his owne discretion in the reuenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honor, (who struck M. de Plessis like a Ruffian coming behind him, and hauing the aduantage of company and his horses ready, shifted himselfe away on the sudden, but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner:) or whether Monsier de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre iust cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgaue him: let any wise man iudge. To this if it bee said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when hee is brought to the Gallowes, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sinnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride petty iniuries or sudden iniuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their own valor; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleene them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, scorneth to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preferred; we may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we doe submit our selues in all controuersies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Cheualrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth bonnie bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Reuenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of seuerall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God vpon supreme Gouvernours, than the permission.

His Maiesty therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeouored) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could neuer doe: in beating down, and extinguisht, that hereditary prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and kingly power, for euermore. And wee haue cause to hope, that his royall care shall bee no lesse happy in preuenting the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outrageous vanity of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must bee added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe & vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their seuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lyes; and such pernicious lyes, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excuseable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poysoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betweene committing presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, priuily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queen Marie of England, and the kings Maiesty now reigning, haue giuen notable testimony of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talar: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporté de plusieurs grandes alliances; whose being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diners great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Marie, vpon a noble man of her own Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiesty, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poyson, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans, euery age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Author of the French Recherches giues vnto vs two notable instances: the one of des Esbars, who (saith Pasquiere) fit mourir Montaigne grand Maistre de France, pour contensser l'opinion de celui dont il estoit lors idolastre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut il fut pendu & estranglé; who caused Montaigne great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Esbars worshipped as his idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly descended, and of great seruice. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue growes old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marseilles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike trial. Hereupon the King (it being easie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges; vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, & of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King, wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, worthy of the kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Liberty; though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falshood in so great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (saith Pasquiere) dont luge pour demonrer tousiours en soy, & ne laisser flatter sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imaginative faueur, qui pour fin de ieule submerge; A faire leçon to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themselves, and not so suffer their consciences to float upon the waves of imaginative faueur, which in the end overwelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue beene answered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vnderferued, That he was tryed, according to his owne desire, by the Lawes of his Countrey, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iustice, surmounting all other his passions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

†. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Consul.

THE last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sicke, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ran currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettielings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a while before, to take arms against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present aduantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell vpon the Suesetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Roman; and wasted their Countrey. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like distemper. They had not reaped such profit of their Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time serued very well, to enrich themselves with the spoile of the Countrey. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driuing away their Colonels, that should haue bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellowes, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Vmber, to their Commanders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martins was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whilest they were deuising, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent vnto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further

ouer-thor themselves; led them to Carthage, there to receive their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie iustice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deserued. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis; Hee caused Albius and Atrius with some thirty other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; He called the Mutiners to assembly; and hauing them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose, he bitterly inueighed against them all, as Traitors. This done, Albius, and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were called to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued euery man his pay when hee was sworne.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue beene contented to bee quiet; but by the seueritie vsed to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof he fought with them; and sending Lalius with all his horse to fetch a compass about the Hills, & charge them in reare, he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preferue themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio; and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes than formerly they had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masanissa; who secretly promised to doe him all seruice, if the people of Rome would send him to make war in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage, that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gaules, and Ligurians, to ioyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent vnto him from Carthage; & he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Town of Gades, without sparing either priuate men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, he landed at Carthage; hoping to haue taken it by surpris. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned backe to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoyle that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him againe to enter into their City. By this hee foresaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vn courteous dealing, he allured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, hee followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isle and City of Gades, was yeilded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succceed him therein; and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome, he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denyed him: for that it had as yet bin granted vnto no Proconsul, excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voyce of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus, ioyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans, might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cesar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were stayed by no such religious impediment from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge; by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so farre off.

Scipio obtains leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Masanissa who was ioyned with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should bee allowed, to bestow part of the money which hee had brought out of Spaine into the treasury; vpon the setting forth of solemne plaies, that he had vowed to make; while hee was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reuiue the memory of his victories already gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassadors analle much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deseruedly, saying, That they were the most happy of all their countrymen, since they being present, had seene him chosen Consul, and should carry home such ioyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadors were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome (though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans) had well deserued. Neuerthelesse, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince: there wanted not many, euen of the principal men, that vehemently said him, Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who seemed to haue beene troubled with that disease, which too often causeth men renowned for long approued vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasury was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled vnto the defence of Rome it selfe, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother: that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul, which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spanish warres, as of lesse moment than the intended voyage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing suffered Asdrubal to passe into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which he vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yeer a Prouince: which the Consul neuerthelesse propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offensiu, than a defensiu warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of money, with leuiues made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprife, he proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: forasmuch as it was noyed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honourable man a little spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleasure, whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicill might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africk. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, comming on the suddaine from the Balears to Genua, and winning the Town, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italy, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. Hee could not indeed raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with ciuill warres. Therefore he was driuen to make choyce of his his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories, & made the ynsteady Gaule, ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the disperfed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay ready to bee employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either comming to his ayde from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) laden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much disaile him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartening him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which hee found, and that fatall voyage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bin pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Inno Lacinia, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greek letters. Such account of winnings-past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infecting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue bene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse; which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was mutually empouerished by this warre; and had already tried the vniuersal way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not in many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the Citie might receive no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he ouer-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vniuersally found in Councils of state, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carry all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wisdom that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceived: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the businesse, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fabius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, hee had from diuers parts of Italy about seuen thousand Voluntaries. He had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for sailes, Axes, Beede-hooks, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helms, and Spears: of all kinde: euery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afford.

Vnto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compass of fife and fortie dayes, he had both feld his Timber, built, and lancht twentie Triteme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies, wherewith he transported his Armie into Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Cannæ: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauy censure. They had serued vnder Marsellus and Leuinus, at the taking of many Cities, and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good vse to him in Africk, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy yong men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly highly to their contentment: but with condition that they should deliuer their Horse and Arms, so as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose, whilst he was prouiding, to haue things in a readinesse for Africk, the banished Locrians, that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, wherby they hoped to recouer their City. Some handicraft-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, and taken prisoners. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadel was surprisid. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Town-men were doubtfully affected: but the best, and caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Cittadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Theeues. The Locrians therefore aduised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had neuer bene committed, without notorious reuenge by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good care to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the iniuries done vnto them; sent for Pleminius, with offers: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharpe inuectiue that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, that tenne Legates were sent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Adiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all, was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journey, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lelius in Africk; rather to make discouery, than to worke any other great effect of warre. Hee tooke a great bootie: and stricke no little terrour into the Carthaginians, who saw their affaires to be vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was. That speaking with Masanissa, hee well informed himselfe of the state of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioine with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his reuolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans: Liuius doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferiour to Liuius, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe; that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Liuius, if it had been true: vnlesse we should beleue, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow wherof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus Appian tells it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loved. Masanissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to bee his sonne-in-law. When

When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great seruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was aduertised: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Onely it seemes, that howsoeuer Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax; yet since this their courtesie proceeded from feare, Hee thought it wise dome to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Linie, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken pieces of his workes remaining) Linie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Tiu. Lib. 19.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crowne descended by order of the Countrey, vnto Desalees the brother, not vnto Masanissa the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanissa shortly dyed: and his elder sonne, who took possession of the kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himselfe Protector ouer the younger which was a childe. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serue: Hee, and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason would haue bene glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable seruice, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not been guiltie of the iniurie by them done vnto him; whilst his Vncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed vnlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice towards his Corriual, warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuerthelesse Masanissa still retained the hearts of his people: and thereby remained strong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though hee was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. Hetherefore keeping much about the lesser Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrey, euen as far as to Hippo; and when Laelius arriued thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the inuasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was repofed more hope of good successe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Masanissa; sent an Embassage into Sicil about the same time, which was little pleasing vnto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not choofe but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was borne and reigned; and for the defence of his beloued wiues Countrey, if it were inuaded. Neuerthelesse he promised to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans & Carthaginians held war abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perswasion could haue done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little aduanced his enterprize; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Aduenturers. Left therefore the faying of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the best way to preuent all discourse, and set the warre vnder taken immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein he willed him to consider, that what hee had promised, hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Hauing sent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voyage; which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, said he, Masanissa hath bene with Laelius: and Syphax hath newly sent to mee; greatly wondring vpon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will prouide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale permitted all further inquisition; that might else haue bene made, concerning the messages of these Embassadors, whose followers had bene scene walking vp and downe Syracus. And lest any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybaeum: and requesting by letters Masanissa, that was Prætor in Sicily, to meet him there; halted thither with his Armie. At Lilybaeum he agreed with the Prætor, about the diuision of the Legions between them; which to haue behind for defence of the Island; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning onely ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirty thousand horse and foot. Concerning his directions from embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them downe; since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither hee, when hee tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Linie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, neere to a fore-land then called the faire Promontorie which how false it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollon, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arriual, helpees to confirme the opinion of Xylander; who thinks the faire Promontorie to haue been the same; that was also called Mercuries cap; since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soon after his arriual, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the Riuer Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollon, whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proposed; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his dis-embarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roued about the Countrey with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which he vsually resorted, like as before hee had met with Laelius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would haue bene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compasse to Vtica, by Land; when he might haue dis-embarked neerer vnto it. Neuerthelesse it may passe as a coniecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentiful Region about the lesser Syrtis; since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybaeum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified vnto Laelius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoeuer they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Armie to bee such, as not onely seemed to inuade the lands of Carthage, but threatened a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might he better aduise them to set sayle for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuiued, or to be leuiued in haste. Asdrubal the son of Gisco, the same that had lately bene chased out of Spaine by Scipio was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his followers, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinitie of King Syphax, made him passeable. Hee was then with the King his son-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance, and commanding the other to make his repair vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which he conueighed aboard his Hulks or Ships of burden, and sent them backe laden into Sicill. He tooke likewise a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numidian horse: whose seruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceiue the vnskillfulnesse of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masanissa before him: who rode vnto the gates; and, by making a brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno so farrre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a Citie of great importance, * of which mention hath bene formerly made, and sate downe before it. Forty to dayes he spent about it, assaying it both by Land and Sea, and vsing all his engines of battery whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of preuayling. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-Campe, which must be well stored against the yeece following. Whilste thus necessitie vrged him to leaue Vtica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprife, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Leuie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neere vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which ioyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio: who thereby tooke occasion to dis-lodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men hee lodged on a Promontorie, ioyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shoare: in the bottome of the Creek he moted his ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the Fleet. The whole campe hee strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the yeece, when it should serue him againe to fight. Of cattell and other bootie Masanissa had brought in great store, by driving the Countrey, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corne also hee had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicill and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, hee frighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare; especially with captiues to be sold for slaues. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neere vnto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the seuerer institution, which the Romans vsed in the discipline of warre, or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neere, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps hee might be wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen proofe before this of his much leuirie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no lesse weary with satiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: he might be moued with a little entreatie to withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King had bene highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was neere at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had bene inuited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe awhile: his wife Queene Sophoniba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoeuer it were, Syphax did onely make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: & that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africke, and so make an end of the warre: wherewith now both Africke and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue care: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadors; he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the king, That the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cab-bins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed coverings of Mattes and Reeds; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carelessly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire, and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, hee fore-saw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrey, wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number; especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought vpon the matter, the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end hee sent many Embassadors, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpose to discover all that might concerne the intended surprife. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idle vp and downe the Campe, might obserue the wayes and entrances, with whatsoeuer else was needfull. When he had learned as much as hee desired: vpon the sudden he sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This hee did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Treachery being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very pensiue; as hauing lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they began to deuise, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusall of peace, as did Marcus Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him? which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in conceipt) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against Vtica before. This hee did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it, partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leaue behinde him in his Campe. Hee caused his men that night to sup well, and betimes, that they might beeready for the iourney. After supper, he appointed such Companies as hee thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seauen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army; the other halfe he committed to Laelius and Masanissa, whom he sent before him to set vpon the campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualty vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and giue Syphax warning to look to himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly; that Laelius and Masanissa, who had a longer iourney, and were to fetch a compass about for feare of being discovered, might haue time to get before him, & do their feat. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of Syphax began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their king himselfe, imputed vnto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe; and others, that had sitten vp late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were, nor giue any remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell vpon the enspies sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masanissa, that best knew the Countrie, did great execution vpon them; hauing laid all the waies, by which hee foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ranne out to help the poore Numidians; carrying onely what would serue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame; and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would haue it. He therefore lost no time: but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their campe; which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had bene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue iudged him worthy to be crucified. It would then haue bene said, that with lesse than one halfe of thirty thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires, had he not bene only carefull how to saue his owne fearefull head. Nevertheless Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to haue bene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would haue striuen to shew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He should not thereby haue done any manner of good, because of the tumult and confederation. I shall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that hath beene is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their severall wayes of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saued themselves in the darke: but they were not many, as after shall appeare. Surely it must needs haue bene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Lixie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often 30 elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seeme to haue followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting vp the summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to haue escaped; forty thousand to haue perished by sword or fire; and about fixe thousand to haue bin taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next town that was very strongly fortified, thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repaire their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which hee thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Townes-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw, that the arriual of Scipio would soone giue an end: Wherefore, lest they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; he shrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the town, which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preserved it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adioyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done, hee returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason, when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable ouerthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make haste prouision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them saw any meanes. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to send for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Armie, they might well defend against themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leaue them: It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, leuying in all haste another Armie; and sending Embassadors to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their vnfortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco was employed to make new leuiies of men: and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax; who hauing gathered together as many as hee could of his subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter; was thinking to returne into his owne kingdom. Sophonisba laboured so with her husband, that at length hee whistled him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, 10 waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to serue in Africk. Of these were made such braue reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they vsed, were not to be resisted. Even the multitude within Carthage belequed these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be, which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole country of Spaine had bene twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales preuailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lie; saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made vp an Army, consisting well-neere of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called, The Great Fields, about five dayes journey 20 from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leauing behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes, after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else it was not in his power to giue such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaille; wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after the best manner, hauing their Italian horse in the right wing, and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; 30 and the Spaniards, the battailo. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntaunted followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Masanissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, euen vntill they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy; since they were thus come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserted of them, than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacie was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne kingdom: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him. 40 Scipio, hauing thus gotten the mastery of the field, tooke counsaile about the prosecution of the warre. It was resolved vpon as the best counsell, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masanissa, with his Numidians, and Lelix, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdom, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice, it seemes that Masanissa gaue; who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his re-stitution into his owne kingdom, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order con- 50 cluded, Lelix was sent away with Masanissa; and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from town to town. Many places yeelded for feare, many were taken by force; and all the subjects of Carthage wauered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnfavourable burdens; which their proud Masters had laid vpon them for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italy. What to do in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolue. Fortune was their Enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who neuertheless of their own free-wil were likely to giue little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadors should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to set out a fleete against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the In-land Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: vpon the safety whereof they said all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at vnity among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not reiected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neurtherlesse, it was considered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre, without any aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That hee should immediately come ouer into Africke, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the Towne: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to imbarque themselves for Italy.

In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a City in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of euery part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible piece adioyning, he easily tooke; the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soone as he drew neere. But whilst he was about there to Incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the City, he might perceiue the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceiued; & stood in great feare, lest his own ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily laden with engines of battery, & wholly disposed in such order, as was most conuenient for assaulting the town) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he hasted away towards Vtica, to assit with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, hee should haue come too late. Neither could he indeed haue beene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried awhile to make a brauado; presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: hee thought it would be sufficient, if he could preferue his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea, it should little auaille the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behinde another, made a foure-fold bridge ouer the Channel of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and backe againe vpon any aduantage or need: but these he couered with planckes, vsing the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to ioine all together, that his men might helpe one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betwene them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnsteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, aduenturing forth from behind the bridge, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw vpon the masts and yards which serued as arches to ioine the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder, in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to saue themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away sixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater than their victory: because among so many grievous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Lalium and Masanissa, in their iourney against Syphax, found as good successe as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masanissa to his kingdom, without farther contention: the Mas-syli, his subiects, ioyfully receiuing him, & forsaking the vsurpers. But here they stayed nor: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Ashubal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Mas-syli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lalium and Masanissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession, bee the title vnto some part neuer so vnjust. Herunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that she had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the garbage of some other fowle, that shee had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeued the kingdom of the Mas-syli to be part of hisentrailes: Lalium and Masanissa will shortly giue him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that king, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had beene conuered into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries, wherein, euen to this day, though there be many strong Towns, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to translate the kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spaine from C. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in haste: and few of them had seene warre before. Encamping neere vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troupes of horse on both sides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foyle at their first meeting with the Enemy, came vp with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouer-charged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilst he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their own Troupes of horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battaile standing now more firme, than a little before, Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much, in vaine, to makethem giue ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian horse, that they beganne presently to dis-band. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnappily, that hee was cast from his horse, which receiued a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsook the place, and fled, and that their king, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanissa told Lalium, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chiefe City of the kingdom; whither he himselfe desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hercubto, Lalius agreed, Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the City to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he preyed for fame, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one strove to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yielded her selfe into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suite, that Masanissa forthwith granted it, and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lalius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Lalius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously, so that at first he would haue haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-intreated by Masanissa, hee suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax, there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministring to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not onely to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, vnproouoked. He briefly answered: That his wife had moued him so to doe, calling her a Fury, and a peeuish creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himselfe, since hee had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Lalius came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcomed, and highly commended in publique, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had tittled her head, and that she was a mischieuous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to detace the memory of his great seruices already done; (for which he should bee highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio, whom hee neuertheless intreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not bee deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after sometime spent in agony, he called vnto him a seruant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes vse then to haue in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them vnwilling to liue:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message; That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserue her from falling aliuie into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for herselfe.

At the receit of this Message and Present, shee onely said; That if her husband had no better token to send vnto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might haue dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funeral. And here withall she boldly dranke off the poyson. Thus Lalius reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath bene spoken before, concerning the precontract betwene Masanissa and Sophonisba. He saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Lalius and Masanissa vpon their way thither, yielding vp their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse, and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; hee fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, she, was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeeres before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore hee would him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim vnto her, wherein he should haue no wrong. Here withall he sent to fetch her away: and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliuer her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gaue vnto her a cup of poyson, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should haue apprehended her. So hee shewed vnto the Romans 10 her dead body, which he royally interred. The sudden violence of Masanissa's his loue, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him: added not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cause (which Lalius notes) 12 of the sudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians, vnder whom he had bin trained vp, and done them great seruice. Howsoeuer it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragick accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should leade him to some inconuenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to diuert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile vpon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took vpon them to create or proclaim a king: Which honour though Masanissa well deserved: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should he haue bene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax's his Dominions. It seemeth not vnlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his troupe of horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might neuertheless haue recovered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subiects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice bene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his kingdome, it was 13 not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they haue wished a fitter opportunity, than of such a man, vpon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masafyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noysed abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politicke sort of grauity, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their saluting him by the name of King, had bene a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, inroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the sonne of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speake more) which held some 14 piece of his fathers kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all meanes to deserue their loue, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was punctilious herein, and answered very grauely, That it was not their custome to giue the honour of that appellation, saue onely vnto such kings, as had greatly 15 deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; & in proceesse of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogatiue, that they imputed as a singular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the salutation by that name, though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

THE Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befalling their good friend Syphax; and vnderstood that Masanissa their immortall enemy, had got possession of his kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their City: where hee made an end of that Fortification, which hee had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the city, which were their Priuy Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not onely prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the * feet of him, and of those that sat in Councell with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to haue vniustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to haue deserved whatsoeuer punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subiect, they would shew mercy vnto the city of Carthage; and let it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be ouerthrowne. Herewithal they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appoyntment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatsoeuer they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men ouer those that were subiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made such adoration to the Romans in their owne necessity, vnlesse they themselves had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnkowne to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poor case the city of Rome then was; and how vnable to defray the charges of continuing the war. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately beene. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the wals of Carthage, though Vtica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission; and told them, That though hee came into Affricke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace; yet hauing the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations vnderstand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Iustice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these: That they should render vp vnto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitiue slaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland betwene Italy and Affricke: That they should deliuer vp all their shippes of warre, saue twenty; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gaue them three dayes: and when they had approued them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masaniissa was dismissed, and went home into his kingdome, as if the war had beene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lalius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy, and gaue hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were fet open; and an holy day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their gods. Lalius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masaniissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African war, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subiects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed vpon him, who by rendering them to liberty, should doe an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behind with Masaniissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captiues; and sent him two purple Caslocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other presents, as in time of their poverty might serue to testifie their good will. Scarcely were these and Lalius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors

were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lalius being sent for, came backe from Ostia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Bellona, that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was onely to winne time, and get respite for warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Affricke, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by removal of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded between them and Lulcius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since beene any warre at all, betwene the people of Rome & the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum; and after that aduentured in like sort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force, as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a leaue of a warre, that had beene so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Lulcius, and other passages following betwene the two Cities. But they excused themselves, by their age: (for they were all yong men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gaine time, vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lalius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, wee finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiuing aduertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approued the Conditions by him propounded, and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceed vnto conclusion. This may with good reason bee beleueed, since it was not vnkowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battell between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be auerfe to them, their forces in Affricke were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came backe from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Affricke, to victuall the Roman Campe, was ouer-taken, by foule-weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wreck, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as wee finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than mere mockery, and therefore cared not for obseruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women & boyes, to be meddling in vproaires; the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out vnder Asdrubal, to gather vp the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recouered the station whereto their camp adioyned) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was herat much offended: not onely for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relieued; but for that by this breach of Truce, he fore-saw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors vnto them, both to require satisfaction for the iniury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace, vpon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, and kissed our feete, after an vn-usuall manner of humilitie, confesting your selues to haue perfidiously broken the League that was betwene vs; and thereby to haue deserved such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soone forget what ye them vntered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your selues worthy to be destroyed, hauing onely recourse vnto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that yee should consider, how long hee hath bin pent vpon in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and vnable to stirre: so that ye are like to find his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or he is be supposed, that he were now in Africke, and ready to giue vs battaile: yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall; remembering that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your selues against hereafter? what gods will yee either sweare by, to be beleued, or call vpon in your misery? what words, and lamentable gesture will ye henceforth vse, to moue compassion? Surely yee haue already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not againe deceiue vs, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves vbraided with the base demeanor of their Embassadors. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadors were very much delighted, in the rehearfall of that point which was yeilded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians took this in so ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian, (I know not why) calles Hanno the Great: or by the very reuerence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two gallies appointed for their safe conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Vtica. He, whether onely desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publike order to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the riuier Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had bene then in safety, since the Roman Camp was euen in sight. The Embassadors tooke this in ill part, not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them, in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose; which was to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal, they slipped away, and made him ouer shoot himselfe. Yet hee gaue them chase, and had well-neere surprised them. But they discovered some Roman Companies on the shoare ouer against them, and therefore aduentured to runne their vessell aground: whereby they saued their owne liues, though a great part of their company were slaine, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonorable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre, that thereby they might bee driuen to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as hauing none other hope remayning. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suite for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not been giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, & teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

In which Hannibal spent the time after the Battaille of Metaurus. The doing of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called one of Italy. How the Romans were deeply affected by Hannibals departure.

Ever since the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Country of the Brutians, waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Linus, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slaine, were contented to be quiet all their yeere. Neither did Licinius the Collegit of Scipio bight worthy of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the penitence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul, who followed Licinius, and Cn. Seruilius Capi, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preferue his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand, that their chiefe enemy was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Africk, wherein they were at no small charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happy conclusion. They stood neuertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paines among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Armie, wherewith to kinde anew the war in Italy, that beganne to waxe cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians, and found them so ready to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Country strong, it might haue proued no lesse needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the country of the Insulbrians, which is about Milth with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthy of his father and brethren, yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull, in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horle, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout: and strained themselves hard; as if at that brunt the victory should haue bene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horle: the seruice of those beasts being fitter for such vse, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horle, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field, their Riders being vnable to manage them: Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more auailable against those that were loose, than against the Troupes that were close and thicke. Then fell the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a showre of darts, and killed foure of them, causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom he had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie, and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length hee receiued a grievous wound in his thigh, whereof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men:

men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides diuers Colonels, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hot piece of seruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would haue much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire homewith all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it selfe was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and imbarqued shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were deliuering their errand. When their message was done, He told them, That this was yet to plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled me to mannage the warre here. Scipio therefore shall not need to bragge, that he hath drawne me home by the heeles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the house of the Barchines, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that, which after came to passe: wherein he imbarqued, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as he could take he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lavinia, which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuary vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no lesse passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leaue their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that hee had not ledde his Armie from Cannæ, hot and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue been foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding ioy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italy: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouer thither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving vnto their gods; & extraordinary great sacrifices publicquely made, for ioy of such happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Country, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remoue of the war from their owne doores, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped, was enough to makethem presume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a greatmasse of Gold and Siluer, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred back vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had bin borrowed in time of more necessity from private men. Hence also proceeded the seuer chastisement, laid vpon those 12. Colonies, that for want either of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and inforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had had beene wont to set out for the Warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very most of their ability. So confident were the Romans growne, though their wealth were not as yet futable to the greatnesse of their spirit, vpon the good successe of the battaile at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italy had beene few daies since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would bee found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax & Asdrubal no specialty of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were eyther of those two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-scullions, that were good for nothing, being himselfe a fit Captaine for such Souldiers. Likewise Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was only good at sauing himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fashed many hundred times in Roman bloud, and wearing the spoyles, not onely of good souldiers, but of braue Captaines, by them slaine. Such talke vied the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell, with many that had slaine Roman Prætors, yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had been first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Armie, as good as euer had seruied in warre, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treates with him about peace in vaine; doth a battaile at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

H Annibal disembarked his Army at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more then one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Enemy; that hee might furnish himselfe of these and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Country, gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horse of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easie for Masanissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that vsed it, preuailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezetullus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector ouer Masanissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduersely to the Numidian kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermine the son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers kingdom, began at the same time to assaile the places that yeelded obedience to Masanissa. This Vermine, as we finde in Liniæ, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would haue made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for peace, whilst they had such a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cause by Warre. But when as they bethought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to indure them, them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad: and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces, Hee thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuerthelesse, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his Embassadors: and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Africke, made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee sent vnto Masanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse a-part. Tenne Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to do him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his kingdome. But he well vnderstood, that those and many more besides all his own forces would but little auaille him; if Hannibal should driue the Romans out of Africke. Wherefore taking such order as he could vpon the sudden, for the safety of his owne kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and sixe thousand Foot he made all haste vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lalius and Fulvius: who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and vnderstood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Babi is one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands vpon them and detained them; sending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Country, that hee had them in his power, & that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; & commanded Babi to vse them with all possible courtesie, & send them safe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his enemies; & caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victory) far lesse honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, Hee made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Town by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoeuer they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to doe, they vsed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no piece of cruelty, when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengeful minds, for the iniuries receiued. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scowts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay; what they were doing, and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, & brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trussing them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleasure, appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them whatsoeuer they desired. This done, Hee gaue them leaue to depart, and sent them away safe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the brauery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden hee grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personal conference, and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well, and returned answer, that Hee would meet him shortly in a place conuenient. The next day Masanissa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remooued vnto a Towne called Nadagata; neere vnto which he sat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, & close by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence hee sent word vnto the Carthaginians, That the time & place did stily serue. If he had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, & came within foure miles of the Enemy: where he incamped well to his owne good liking in all things else, excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a piece of ground; which was before well searched for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off; and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginians, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africke & of Italy; for that the Countries of Sicill and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had beene lost, and of so much blood as had beene shedde, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: Hee said, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreame dangers their owne Cities had beene exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition Hee affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared; that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. Yet (said he) mine owne example may peradventure suffice, to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal; who after my victory at Cannae, wonne the greatest part of Italie: and desirous with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome, which I hoped easily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change? I stand heere entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes instabilitie. I haue sought what thy father, Scipio: He was the first of the Roman Generalls, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke, that the time would come, that I should haue such businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, wherof wee see buth many. And thou maist haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soone I thinke vpon M. Atilius. If he would haue hearkened vnto such persuasions, as I now vse to thee; he might haue returned home to Rome an happy man. And so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will giue thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicill, Sardinia, and whatsoeuer Ilands else are situate betweene Italie and Africke, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt haue glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for vs: our owne quiet shall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully obserue the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must vnderge for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maist haue without contention: It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it please thee, stay but untill to morrow night, and thou maist take such fortune, as it please the gods. The issue of battaile is vncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele wee shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victory, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more lido, make peace. And doe not tell me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee; which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Country. And thinking it expedient, I will alwaies maintaine it: like as I haue maintained, vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie me, the warre by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicill and in Spaine which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the finall issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee most iust. As for the mutability of Fortune hee said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence, or over-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all these Countreies, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had beene propounded whilst as yet wee detained some part of Italy, they might peradventure not haue beene reieced. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit vnto you any one piece of these my former demands, to which the Carthaginians haue yielded already, and thought mee to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the iniuries which they haue done me since, haue made them unworthy of obtaining peace vpon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldest be glad to make thy Citizens vnderstand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes eased. Onely thou must thinke, that in like sort it concernes me in honour, not to let them be gainers or sauers by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore vnto vs ransom-free, all prisoners that they haue of ours; to pay vs fine thousand Talents; to deliuer vp their Gallies; and to deliuer hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce, their spoiling of our Fleet, and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these iniuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what answer to giue you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame your owne selves for that I haue denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell between Rome & Carthage. The next morning at breake of day they issued into the field: a notable march, and such as hath very feldome been found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, diuided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behinde these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Tuarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custom of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was vsuall, might fall backe betwene the Principes; but he placed them directly one behinde another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites, or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, he gaue direction, that when they found themselves to be over-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behinde all their owne Armie; thereby leauing roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to saue themselves on the voyde ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battalies, without cloying vp the way betweene the Maniples, which hee desired to keepe open. His Italian horie he placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masanissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vsing words, not many, but forcible. Hee bade them remember what they had atchieued, since their comming into Africke. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victory in this war, should make them Lords of all the world; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flie. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Africke, that would giue them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: vnlesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercilesse Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, & take resolution answerable thereunto, haue neuer beene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore, in Front

Front of his Battaile. Next behinde these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Baleares and Moores. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians & Africans, more interessed in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence: Opposite to Lelius, in his owne right wing hee bestowed the Carthaginian Horie. Tychas and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masanissa. Hee was indeed farre too weake for the Enemy in Horie, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tychas and Mezerubus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the foure thousand of Masanissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leuiued in the haste of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the son of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteene thousand and vpwards, the most of them Horie, the aduantage of number might haue serued well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their feuerall conditions: promising vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatening the Carthaginians with ineuitable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. Hee bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many; as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Cannae. Hee willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. Hee told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; euen such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry battalies, could no longer be trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countreie. As for the rest: they were young men, the sons of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slain or chased. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, vpon whose vertue hee meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strue to make good their honour, and to purchase the fame of men inuincible.

Such exhortations vsed the two Generals before the fight. When they drew neere together, the Numidian Horie men on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were alwaies an vncertaine kind of help) those that stood neere vnto the point of the left wing, turned back for feare: and ran vpon their own Numidian Horie; which they affrighted and disordered. Masanissa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to re-ally themselves, draue them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themselves, which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Diuers of them receiuing many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ran backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horie which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lelius the same aduantage, that Masanissa had against the Numidians; which he vsed in like sort. In the meane while, the battalies of foot aduanced, and drew neere together with a slow and watery pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gaue a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacity, and in quicknesse, to haue the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Roman discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastati, encouraged their fellowes, and shewed themselves ready, if need were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leiued Carthaginians & Africans, when they saw their hired souldiers giue back, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gaules, and the rest, to thinke themselves betrayed: whereupon they enclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retrait; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng; had their hands full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or save these Run-awaies. Hee caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would haue ruined vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaile, and save themselves in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slipperie with blood: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should bee dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable ouerthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the maine battaile of the Hannibalian. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triarii: He placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one front with the Hastati, and made of them histwo Cornets. This done, hee aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer hee had bene receiued in his life before. All the dayes worke till now, seemed to haue bene a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; (and perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution; that no man gaue backe one foot; but rather chose to die on the ground, whereon hee stood. So that, after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worke: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of 40

Masaniissa and Lelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue bene most happy and in a needfull time. These vpon a sudden charged the Hannibalian in Rere; and ouer-bearing them by mere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaile there died of the Romans fifteene hundred and vppwards: on the Carthaginian side, aboue twenty thousand, besides as many that were taken, of whom, Sopater Capaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Linus reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage to take battaile with such disadvantage, he could worke no manuels. Hee saued himselfe with a few Horse, and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage; from which he had bene absent fixe and thirtie yeeres. At his comming into the Senate hee said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadors againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoyled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arriued, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this this Fleet, and that which he had before, hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions hee committed vnto Cn. Octavius; whom hee willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lelius away to Rome with newes of the victory, he set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by ten Embassadors from the City: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, began to vse the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they receiued none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would giue them audience. So rowing along before the City: and viewing it more in brauery, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned back to Vtica, and called back Octavius thither; with whom in person hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the son of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seemed to haue bin both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beat him, but so compasse him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leaving fiftie thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bin with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should haue bene far better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horse. But God had other wise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access vnto the former, yet serued well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadors from Carthage: whose behaviour though it was more pittifull than it had bin before, yet procured it lesse commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Neuerthelesse it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would proue, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Seruilius Capio, that Consul who had charge of the warre against 30 Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicill (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Seruilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Prouince of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going, procuring onely leave of the Senate, that he being Consul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere He could haue his Fleet and all things in a readinesse for the journey, where- in no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tost at Sea with 40 soule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so hee returned home a priuate man. Then came the ioyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now euen at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africk for his Prouince, That hee said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, vntill hee had first his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to giue the more fauourable answer vnto the Carthaginian Embassadors. Hee willed them to consider 50 what they had deserued: and in regard thereof to thinke themselves well dealt withall in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes; without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subiection; leaving also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. Astouching the rest hee was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilest the late Treatie was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee, That immediatly they should deliuer up vnto the Romans all Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make no warre at all thenceforth out of Africke, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countreies, Townes, goods whatsoever, belonging any wise unto Masanilla, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should bee all by them restored unto him: That they should finde corne for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should paye tenne thousand Talents of Silver, in the terme of fiftie yeeres, by two hundred Talents a yeere; and that for obseruance of Conditions, they should giue an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choose, being none of them under foureteene yeeres of age, nor above thirtie.

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home, and reported them vnto the Citie. They were very vnpleasing; and therefore one Geseo stood vp to speake against them: and exhorted the people, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this, and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, rose vp and spake vnto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citie would allow; forasmuch as he had bene thence absent euer since he was a Boy of nine yeeres old, vntill he was now a man of fife and fortie. Hauiug thus excused himselfe of the disorder, hee discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselves; had the Demands of the Enemy bene yet more rigorous. Finally, vpon good aduice, they resolved to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand fife and twenty thousand pounds weight of silver, in recompence of damages, and iniuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadors. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gaue iniunction, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadors any whither else, nor yet dismisse any Embassadors to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counsailes. Asdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Emballages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadors, who related vnto the Senate and People these ioyfull newes. About the same time arriued at Rome Embassadors from Philip King of Macedonia: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite awhile for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Pretors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified vnto their King, that they found themselves grieued; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadors, that had lately bene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behinde his fellows; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countri-men, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay; and being taken prisoners in Africke, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured so many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to help them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiect ion. As for Sopater: hee affirmed him to bee one of the Kings Counsaile, and very inward with him; one that serued not for money; but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadors could make vnto the Senate no good answere: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre he sought, and and warre he should finde, if he proceeded as hee had begun. For in two maine points hee had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romans: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that he had ayded their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Easterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadors in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Asdrubal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessitie of sending Embassadors to Carthage, vpon the like errand. Hee liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Romans side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citie, that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and himselfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euened at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had bene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadors: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified, though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Periuice, as they themselves might haue laid vpon the Romans, if their diligence and fortune had been such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Asdrubal made answer; Even by the same gods, that are so seuerer vnto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Consul interposing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace, for that hereby hee was like to lose the honour, which hee purposed to get by making warre in Africke. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadors humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might visite their Countreimen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransom and carry home with them some, that were their especiall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors would choose, should be sent ouer into Africke, and be freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leaue, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their coming into Africke, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuersie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitiues and Renegado's, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegado's, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romans than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeeres; it was thought meet to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collection of the summe there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; so as many, euened of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not restraîne from laughter. For which when he was checked by Asdrubal Hadus, and told, That it worst of all befecimed him to laugh, since he had bin the cause why all others did weep; He answered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but sometime from extremie indignation. Yet, said He, My laughter is more seasonable, and lesse absurd, than your teares. For yee should haue wept, when yee gaue up your Shippes and Elephants, and when yee bound your owne hands from the vse of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps vs vnder; and holds vs in assured seruitude. But of these matters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your priuate purses, yee haue thereof thereof some sense. God grants that the time come not hereafter, whereby, hathfull acknowledgement. That it was the very least part of your miserie; for which yet heinous lord these hautes. Thus did he scourged Hannibal vnto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne misdoers, which had bred this grievous disease, accused the Physician, whose noble and laudable had bin employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being to take leaue of Africk, produced Masinissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vnderstandedly. To him also he consigned ouer those towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: where in, to say truth, he gaue him but his due; & that which ought to be known by not well how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, & friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the desertings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done: Wherefore the Romans embarked themselves for Sicilie: where when they arrived at Lilybæum, Scipio with some part of his Army tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His iourney through Italy was no lesse glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. Hee entered the Citie in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph; and died soone after in prison: or whether hee were dead awhile before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be allowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult ouer the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that glorious warre past, whereof the Romans had bin in a manner without hope that euer they should see Italy free. This made them looke cheerefully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion, and filled them with more ioy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Prouince which he had subdued. This honourable kinde of surname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

CHAP. III.

Of PHILIP the father of PERSEVS, King of Macedon:
His first Acts and Warre with the Romans; by whom hee was subdued.

S. I.

How the Romans grew acquainted in the East Countries, and desirous of warre there. The beginning of many Princes, with great warres, at one time. The Ætolians ouer-run Peloponnesus. Philip and his Associates make warre against the Ætolians. Alteration of the State in Sparta. The Ætolians invade Greece and Macedon, and are invaded at home by Philip.

The great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath bene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subiect that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needes bee finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, wee are lesse to wonder, if wee finde lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious obnoxious vnto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundrie men are ouer-ruled; in manning the affaires of our daily life. It may be obserued in the change of Empires, before those times whereof wee now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the Kingdome of Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threescore thousand Horse: but failing in their intended conquest, they became subiect within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with such number of men, as might haue seemed resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home againe, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leisure from intestine Warre, deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old souldiers, had vnderaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well-trayned Armie, had made attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, haue bene farre different. Yet would it then haue bene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men; rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words vled by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kinde it may bee, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so auailable to victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-vnderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noyse, aduventure to prouoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their owne glorie should bee foyled by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him as (I take it) Enilmerodach, had stumbled, Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entered into warre against the Romans. This warre hee vnderooke as it were for his minds sake: hauing received no iniurie, but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that serued vnder him, to preuaile so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should onely serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicill and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their own vertue to be of richer mettall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and whatsoeuer else had serued to make him terrible) serue only to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselves. For since they had overcome the best Warriour in Greece, euen him, that being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vnwarlike Prouinces, which in compasse of 12. yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had wonne? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion by some good meanes, the whole Countrey of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow of it selfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punicke warre was ended, which followed soone after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Tima made at the same time cruell war vpon the Greekes: wasting their Countrey, and sacking their Townes, onely because they were vnable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous, to enter, the Queene was not slow to giue them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to bee desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadors, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for loue of Greece they had vnderaken this Illyrian warre. Thus beganne the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards encreased verry hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian, whose businesse with them, being now the subject of our storie, it is meet that wee should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions: It was like to prove a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. yeeres, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countreys knowne; and 3. of them young boyes; in 3. of the greatest Kingdomes. This hapned from the third yeere of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great; Ptolemie Philopater succeeded in the Kingdom of Aegyptus vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. yeeres old, received the Kingdom of Macedonia, together with the Patronage of the Achæans and most of the Grækes; by the decease of his Vnkle Antigonus Dofon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About this same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedæmon, & the Countreies about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reigne in Cappadocia; Lycurgus found means to make himselfe King ouer the Lacedæmonians, whose Commonwealth, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achæus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebelle vnto him, occupied the Regions neere vnto Mount Taurus, & kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeeres of the hundred & fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome & Carthage; & that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, & the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achæans, and many others his dependants. That Countrey, having freed itselfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes; was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian; than it should haue bene to the Spartans; & therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Ætolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Ætolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted vnto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, than it was vnjust; whereby with greater ease they made spoyle of the Countrey, finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achæans, were called by the Messenians to help; which they did the more willingly; because the Ætolians passing without leaue through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Aratus could hardly abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the iniuries; wherewith most ingratfully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Achæans. Hee was therefore so hastie to fall vpon this their Army, that hee could hardly endure to stay few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Achæans for the yeere following. But his anger was greater than his courage; and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath bene already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a part of the Countrey, wherein he might very easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them to neere, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achæans, they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacy. Shortly after, the Ætolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There ioyned with them, in this their second inuasion, a great number of the Illyrians; who neglecting that Condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war vnto the Coast of Greece: made bold to seek aduentures againe, & did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell vpon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Ægean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scerdila, hauing gotten gotten what they could else where by running at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made great havoc in the Countrey, now, than in their former Expeditiō, and returned home with much spoyle, and any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, who came to Corinth, and because men were desirous to satisfy themselves with some speedy reuenges, there were that vrged to haue some great punishment layd vpon the Lacedæmonians, who were thought vnder hand to haue favoured the Ætolians, in this despite of the Achæans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately bene oppressed. It is true, that the Lacedæmonians had bene so affected: and which was worse, at the arrival of Philip, they flew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appease them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they yett commit themselves to iudgement, but considered the King that haue vnder his hand, from committing to them with an Army, since their Towne was so much besieged with gull, discord, which they hoped to appease, and meant alwayes to continue in his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that hee was rather old, Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him, did not understand the Lacedæmonians; but for that hee was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achæans, Boeotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Ætolians; and desiring to haue war decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Ætolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time; if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium, for that purpose; whither if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day. But when the Ætolians understood this for certain, they adioyned the Council vnto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters, ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus, and the onely man in that sort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedonia, where hee prepared busily for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words, and promises; whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, forasmuch as the Ætolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achæans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedæmonians; requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war vnto the Ætolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Herevnto they receiued diuers answers, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Ætolians, of whom they stood in continuall danger, said, that they could not honestly refuse to they their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheless more cunning and reserved, so that they stood vpon a needlesse point, and desired to be held excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the warre was vnderaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne, which the Ætolians held vpon their borders, and said, that they durst not beouer bold, vntill that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedæmonians, the chiefe of them studied onely how to manage the Prætor, for which there City had bene so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had thre yeeres together continued subiect against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of Egypt, to reigne ouer them againe, and maintaine, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephors. Of these there were some; that thought the publike safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had persecuted them: And hereto they referred all their counsailes; being perhaps a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound vnto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part, were still devising how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his returne, & sought to soyme with the Aetolians, which were the most likely to giue him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders or any other violent courses to set forward their desire. Neyther did it suffice, that about these times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death: For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying vnto themselves the glory of their Antecessors in such Ages past, as were not like to come againe: Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatnesse and lustre, to which once hee had in a manner performed: But since hee was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deserving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and those of the race of Heracles, as in former times: For that without such helpe, they must continue little better than subjects vnto the Macedonian, and farre lesse by him respected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Aetolians to send an Embassage to Sparta, which proposed the matter openly vnto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst haue made himselfe the Author. Much disputation, and hot, there was, betwene those of the Macedonian party, and those their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded, vntill by massacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Aetolians, the difference of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betwene the Lacedæmonians and Aetolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans, who had spared the Citie, when they might haue destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King, that we may iustly wonder, how they grew so careless in making choyce of the other. In the one of their royall Families they found Agisippus, the sonne of Agisipolis the sonne of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as heire apparant to his grandfather. This Agisippus was a yong Boy, standing in neede of a Guardian: and had an vncke, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Gouvernement. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how young soeuer, should haue his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedæmonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in obseruation of the Law, that they made this childe their King, and appointed his vncke Cleomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the royall Family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime, but made election of on Lysurgus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdome, bestowed vpon each of the Ephors, a Talent, and thereby made himselfe bee saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Heracles. This Lysurgus, to gratifie his Partisans, and to approue his worth by action, inuaded the Countrey of the Argiues: which lay open and vnguarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and won diuers Townes; whereof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedæmon. After such open hostility, the Lacedæmonians declared themselves on the Aetolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gaue vncertaine answer: the Messenians would not stirre: all the burden must lie vpon themselves and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Aetolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could inuade at pleasure, as they were like to doe, and by helpe of the Lacedæmonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Aetolians, passing ouer the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towne of Aegira: which if they could haue held, they should thereby grievously haue molested the Achæans, for that it stood in the mid-way betwene Aegium and Sycion, two of their principall Cities; and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Aegira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoyle, whilst they that should haue made it their first care, to assure the place vnto themselves, by occupying the citadell and other peeces of strength, fell heedlesly to ransacke priuate houses, and thereby gaue

the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great slaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Aetolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Achæia, waisting all the Territorie of the Dymæans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achæan Confederacie. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so well beaten, that the enimie grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe vnto their Prator, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achæans hauing lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries, forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his warre, they had couetously with-held part of their due from those that serued them therein. So through this disability of the Achæans, and insufficiency of their Prator, the Dymæans, with others, were driuen to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike seruice, & to conuert the money to their own defence. Lysurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to win vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip & the Achæans. Philip came to the borders of the Aetolians, whilst their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: & by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier peece, which they desired to get into their owne hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia: There he spent forty dayes, ere he could end the busines, which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Aetolia at his first comming in, it was thought that he might haue had an end of the war: But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunity of Associates, to haue their own desires fulfilled, conuerts the preparations of great kings to those vses for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their maine designs. Thus was our king Henric the eight led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperor to the siege of Tournay: at such time as the French king Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Terwin was lost, and that his Caualerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Essex with seuen hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittain, in feare that Henric would haue come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracius, did wondrously embolden the Aetolians: in such sort, as their Prator Scopas aduentured to leade all their forces out of the Countrey, and therewith not onely to ouer-runne Thessalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He came as farre as to Diium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Ægean Sea; which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, He tooke, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the rest, hee threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrey-men at his returne, forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to bee growne terrible, nor onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Diium. Philip hauing dispatched his worke at Ambracius, made a strong inuasion vpon Aetolia. He tooke Phœtia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Præanium, Elæus, and diuers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Aetolians in sundry skirmishes, and waisted all the Countrey ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Achæan Embassadors, newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardaniens were ready with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrey. These Dardaniens were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hæmus from the Northerne part of Macedon, & were accustomed to seeke booty in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a iourney into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey, as had bene their manner vpon the like advantages. This made the King to dismissthe Achæan Embassadors, (whom he should haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeere. So hee tooke his way homewards: and as hee was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired vnto him Demetrius Phariæus, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Dofon in the warres of Cleomenes; and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcometo the Macedonian King: whose Counsaillour he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Atolians rested not. They auenged themselves vpon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Atolia, they required with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre, vntill another yeere, was laid aside: Philip stole a iourney into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horse. As soone as he was within Corinth, He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word should be carried forth of his arriual. He sent priuily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would haue the Achæan Souldiers ready to meete him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrey, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse, little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeepe they had little cause to feare; since the Achæans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians, vntill they heard, that these two thousand Eleas, Atolians, and their fellowes, were by him surpris'd, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which he did at his first comming, Philip got very much reputation; and likewise he purchas'd both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediately following. He won Plophis, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia, which the Eleas and Atolians then held. He won it by assault at his first comming: wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemy, not beleeuing that he would undertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeere, was carelesse of providing euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preserued by the King from sacke, & giuen to the Achæans, of his own meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for very feare, hearing how easily he had taken Plophis. This Towne also he gaue to the Achæans. The like liberality he vsed towards others, that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrey of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three daies; He proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Atolians in the spoiles of their other wise deserting neighbours. Great abundance of Garrell hee tooke, with great numbers of slaues, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could be found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes, wherein a great multitude of the Countrey-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his iourney, by sending Hambassadors to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to set themselves at libertie, by seeing the King to neere; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Atolian Captaines, because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King wonne more Townes in the Countrey, than the sharpe froste of Winter would suffer him to stay three daies. Faine he would haue fought with the Atolians; but they made such haste from him, that he could not ouertake them, till they had couer'd themselves with in the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to haue bene safe. But Philip assailed them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this expedition, the King reposed himselfe awhile in Megalopolis; and then remoued to Argos, where hee spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arriual in Peloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians, with Lycorgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; & threatned to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleas, of the danger hanging

ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycorgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with money: so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him, nor from those ielousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common wealth. Hee wonne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycorgus his house; who perceiuing the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto pre-disposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst he was vsing his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiued whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So he liued afterwards among the Achæans a banished man; and hated of his owne people. As for Lycorgus, hee returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found means to driue out his fellow-King young Agisipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to bee suspected, in such sort, as once hee should haue bene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue bene defended; yet rather than to aduenture himselfe into iudgement, he chose to flie for a time, and so iourne among his friends the Atolians. His well-knownne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne surmise against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, He tooke better heede vnto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that he chased Agisipolis out of the Citie; I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three Vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three very iustly deserved. Whatsoeuer he was toward some priuate Citizens: in the warre against Philip, he behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countreys good.

Now Philip was misadvised by ill Counsaillors, who afterwards wrought treason against him; and miserably punished. Hee made the Atolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted vnto them.

Whilst the King lay at Argos deuising vpon his businesse for the yeer following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their own greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that hee tooke in hand. Antigonus Dofon had left vnto Philip such Counsaillors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chiefe of these was Capelles, that had the charge of his person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that hee should be a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if hee could reduce the Achæans vnto the same degree of subiection, wherein the Macedonians stood. To bring this to passe, during the late Expedition he had caused some of the Macedonians to thinke this Achæan out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proddoring further as beaflow fell out, hee was bold to chide some of that Nation, causing his Ministers to take good whippes abhain. If any of them offered, as there were some, to stand up that could not reffraine, to helpe their fellowes; that he laid by the heels, and punished by Ministers. Hereby he thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that he should be qualified with the habite of blind obedience; and think nothing vnjust than pleased the King. But these Achæans were tenderly sensible in matters of libertie, and were so, if they could haue bene contented so to suffer any little little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the war against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves vnto olde Aratus; and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbade Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. Hee thought so well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court, promising to become their especial friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as hee continued to make much of Aratus, hee must be faine to deale precisely with the Achæans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quick ly brought to conforne themselves vnto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to bee present at Ægium, where the Achæans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue bin needefull in a businesse of more importance, the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new fauourites, was chosen Prætor, in stead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yeelded it vp for feare, at his first coming; whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymæans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner, because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vndertook to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and ioyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand; That hee would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all foreign inuasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-hastie to beleue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breede a mutuall diffidence betwene them, and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him prisoner vnto Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe, in better for Aratus. For the king (as was said) mistrusting what should be the cause, that hee heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsaillor thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that olde Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the kings good. And long of him he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out: For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside & giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very preiudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the kings offers. All this was a falselie; deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance making talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all he rested, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans; and therein hauing made it knowne what ye are, to depart into Macedonia; and leaue you to your selues. Olde Aratus grauely admonished the King; That whensoever he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to giue credit, vntill hee had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the king should make himselfe the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the king liked well, and said that hee would make sufficient inquiry. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilst Apelles delayed to bring in the prooffe, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The king was not forgetful, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arati: which when he found no better than a meere deuce against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The worst full tempest of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe, beganne (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Arati; so sayling of them; he thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chieftie; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtile workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontinus Captaine of the Targuettiers, & Megalas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remooue the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinary way; by calumnie and priuie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he vsed more finenesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, & one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill spare from being alwaies in his presence. By such Art hee thought to haue remooued him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Summer. In the mean season Aratus retired himselfe; and sought to auoide the dangerous trendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; Hee was a man of no dispatch; and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corne; wherewith hee should haue bene furnished by the Achæans. This made the King vnderstand his owne errour; which hee wisely sought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Achæans to reiourne their Parliament from Ægium, to Sydon, the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his son, perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, He easily obtained what he would of the Achæans. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand, with great store of Corne; and further decreed, That so long as he himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, hee should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so he might inuade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe, even by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracie with Leontinus and Megalas; binding himselfe and them by Oath, to crosse and bring

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middelt of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the Battaille at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian Warre. Hereby hee grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Aetolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Aetolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing Warre betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians, had subdued one the other, it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all meanes to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrey should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of warre, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly seruing, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such aduice could the Aetolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatening them at hand: but being soone after wearie of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from obseruing and following their own good counsell, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrey, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrey) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betwene Hannibal and Philip.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italy, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaille of Cannæ: after which hee ioyned in league with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise beene farre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall tearmes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which hee followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Aetolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon such Conditions that might easily be broken: haue beene related in another place, as belonging vnto the second Punicke Warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downe the tenour of the League betwene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthy to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to haue beene inserted into a more busie peece.

The Oath and Couenants betweene Hannibal, Generall of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassador of Philip King of Macedon.

THIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with Xenophanes the sonne of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the sonne of Demetrius hath sent vnto vs, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Iuno, and Apollo: before † The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and † Tolaus, before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sun, the Moone, and the Earth; before Riuers and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods, that haue power ouer Carthage; before all the Gods that rule ouer Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of warre, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betwene You and Vs, that this oath stand for friendship and louing affection, that wee become friends, familiar, and brethren, vpon Courant, that the safetie of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians vsing the same Lawes; and of the Vticans, & as many Cities & Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which we hold friendship in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold friendship or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preferred by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates. In like manner shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Associates, be saued and preferred by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italy. Wee shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subletie, we shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Townes, and Hauens, with which we haue already league and friendship. wee also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which wee haue already league and friendship. The warre that we haue with the Romans, haue we also with them, untill the Gods shall giue vs a new and happie end. Wee shall aide Vs with those things whereof wee haue need, and shall doe according to the Couenants betwene Vs. But if the Gods shall not giue vnto You and Vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, wee shall make friendship in such wise that wee shall be partakers of the same friendship, with Condition, That they shall not haue power to make warre vpon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords ouer the Corcyreans, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render vnto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make warre vpon You or Vs; wee will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue need. The same shall be obserued in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom wee hold already league and friendship. To this league if we or You shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or deduction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

How Philip yeelded to his naturall vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize vpon the free States his Associates: with the troubles, into which hee thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punic warre. Hee poysoneth Aratus: and growes hatefull to the Achæans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, hee might haue offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punic warre, proceeded from a royall greatness of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath bene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly gouerned him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listig to doe what he ought, thah so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before hee should busie himselfe in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Hereunto Apelles had aduised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if he might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunity at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reins in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betwene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as hap. 30 pens often after a forreign warre) vnto domestickall objects, than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In proesse of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strue any more about their Gouernment: for that hee would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his coming thither, hee found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in priuate with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the vnrule Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few, as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it but to goe roundly to worke, ere that hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Oratours, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the people tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemed, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogs their guardians were slaine. But his fallshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear, to tel him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But hauing already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should need the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as hee could. Hee ledde olde Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There hee pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place

to his owne vse, for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which he had already commanded the entrance into that Countie. Whilst he was therefore sacrificing, and had the entralls of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner, hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a little: were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angry words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou be a soothsayer, thou must goe thy waies, and let slip this good advantage; If thou bee a King, thou must not neglect the opportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus hee spake, resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in durie, as he had done hitherto, by their owne good wills, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies. To this good aduice Philip yeelded at the present: but not without some dislike; thenceforth growing betwene him and the Arats, whom he thought more froward than be- 10 seemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as hee plainly discovered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceiued, that in resorting to his house, He had bene dishonest with his sonnes wife. He therefore staid at home; where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countryman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That vn honest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers & dependants, and so they purposed to continue. But He would needs haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his Will, He seized vpon their Towne of Orgeum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to help them. Thus in stead of settling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench, vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilst hee was thus labouring to binde the hands that should haue fought for him in Italy: M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts, who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre, the occurrences whereof wee haue related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In manning whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another journey into their Countie, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore werenot hasty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies; invaded them with open Warre. But in that warre he could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him 10 in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messene he lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsellor and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that hee sped, the more angry hee waxed against those that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, hee poysoned old Aratus; and shortly after that he poysoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue bene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselves were more sure than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto

Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to be celebrated every yeere twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose, as was accustomed vnto the Athenians, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to haue beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollon, which is like enough to haue beene true, since the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The folowing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the *Achaean*s a maruellous dislike, of that wicked King, which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter; when they better dare to take countsaile for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally known or beleued: neither were they in case to subfist, without his helpe that had committed it. The Etolians were a most outrageous people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans made a league, whereof the Conditions were soone diuulged, especially that maine point, concerning the diuision of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Etolians should haue the country and Townes; but the Romans the spoyle, and carry away the people to sell for slaues. The *Achaean*s, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make freight alliance with the Etolians, as knowing their vniuersall disposition; were much the more auerse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greeks account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauock of the Countrey. The same consideration moued also the Lacedaemonians, to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Etolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industry therefore of Philop, and the great care which he seemed to take of the *Achaean*s his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them; especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himselfe the Dymeans, by an inestimable benefit: recovering their Towne after it had beene taken by the Romans and Etolians; and redeeming their people wherefoer they might be found, that had been carried away Captiue, and sold abroad for slaues. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences past; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen men to vnderstand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof hee was not ashamed; He tooke Polyarcha the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serue to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time: for, of that which hapned in this their first Inuasion, I hold it superfluous to make repetition.

S. V.

Of Philopemen Generall of the *Achaean*s: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedaemon. A battaile betwene them, wherein Machanidas is slaine.

IT happens often, that the discafe of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopemen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the *Achaean*s redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopemen: who being then a young man, and hauing no command, did especiall seruice to Antigonus at the battaile of Selassia against Cleomenes. Thence forward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom by either at peace betwene themselves; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, traauiling with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of seruice, that he made the *Achaean*s very strong in that part of their Forces. Being afterward chosen Prator or Generall of the Nation, He had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrey might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others; Hee perswaded the *Achaean*s to cut off their vaine

expence of brauery in appareled household stuffe, and curious farr, and to bestow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to procure the better Souldiers, and surable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had seduced hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast a farr off that were vsuall in skirmishing: at some distance, or for Surprises, or sudden and hasty Expeditions; whereto Aratus had beene most accustomed. But when they came to handle strokes, they were good for nothing; so long as they were wholly driuen to rely vpon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopemen altered this: causing them to arm themselves more weightily, to vse a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for seruice at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order, and altered the forme of their embattailing; not making the Files so deep, as had been accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the seruice of many hands.

Eight months were spent of that yeer, in which he first was Prator of the *Achaean*s; when Machanidas, the tyrant of Lacedaemon caused him to make triall, how his souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the successor vnto Lycurgus, a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a strong Army of Mercenaries; and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta, but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the *Achaean*s; that were fauourers of liberty; but to strengthen himselfe by friendship of the Etolians; who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedaemon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argiues, *Achaean*s, & Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Etolian Faction. Very vniuersally. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindred them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindered themselves thereby from recouering the Maistrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his owne security, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him readie to fall vpon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turne face another way. Thus had he often done; especially in the absence of Philop: whose sudden comming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him faile of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the *Achaean*s, and thought his owne men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilst Philop theretore was busied else-where, he entred the Countrey of the Mantians; being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the Lordship of Peloponnesus, as hauing stronger friends, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopemen was ready to entertaine him at Mantinea; where was fought between them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the field vpon Carriages a great many of Engines, wherewith to beat vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopemen sent forth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one & the other side came in continuall supply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the *Achaean*s & of Machanidas, were drawn vp to the fight: being so farr aduanced, each before their owne Phalanx; that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vnseruiceable, by the interposition of his own men; in such manner as the Canon is hindred from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not onely by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obserueth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein usually the hired souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which liue oppressed by Tyrannie; since the one, by doing their best in fight, haue hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves; whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to assure their owne seruitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his prosperity, haue good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their own; whereas they that serue vnder a free State, haue no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the victory: many companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast and therefore such good fellows will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victory of a Tyrant makes him stand in need of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more subiects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seeke to take reuenge vpon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Achæans, being forced to giue ground, were vrged so violently in their retreat by those of Machinidas, that shortly they betooke themselves to flight; and could not be staied by any persuasions of Philopemen, but ran away quite beyond the battaile of the Achæans. This disaster had bene sufficient to take from Philopemen the honour of the day; had he not wisely obserued the demeanour of Machinidas, and found in him that error which might restore the victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gaue chase vnto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battail his Lacedæmonians, whom he thought sufficient to deale with the Achæans, that were already disheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of sight, Philopemen aduanced towards the Lacedæmonians that stood before him. There lay between them athwart the Countrey a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passible (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians aduentured ouer it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Achæans; who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaille; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Achæans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest beganne to shrink: so as Philopemen getting ouer the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopemen knew better how to vse his aduantage, than Machinidas had done: He suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chase: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the tyrant must come backe. The tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chase, looked very heauily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lusty troupe of Horse about him, he made towards the bridge: hoping to finde the Achæans in disorder; and to set vpon their backs, as they were carelessly pursuing their victory. But when hee and his company saw Philopemen ready to make good the bridge against them; then began euery one to look, which way he might shift for himselfe. The tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the ditch side, and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassock, & the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopemen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge to another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting ouer it, slew him there with his owne hand. There dyed in this Battaille of the Lacedæmonians side about foure thousand: and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achæan Mercenaries, probable it is that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that Warre was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should haue need.

§. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bythinia, and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victory the Achæans learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of warre inferiour to any, that should haue brought against them no great ods of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great vse of them: but when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very secretly together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achæans would haue done him seruice, they must, by helping him to oppress others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had ioyned with the Romans and Ætolians in warre against him.

This

This Attalus, though a king, was scarce yet a Noble-man, otherwise than as hee was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Phileterus his Vncle: who being gueldded, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a child; grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged vnto wiuers or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first, and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke him selfe to Lyfimachus King of Thrace. Lyfimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accompts. But when at length he stood in feare of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant: He fled into Asia, where he seized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lyfimachus. The Towne and money, together with his owne seruice, hee offered vnto Seleuchus the first, that then was ready to giue Lyfimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleuchus hauing slaine Lyfimachus, dyed shortly after himselfe, before he made vse of Phileterus or his money. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countrey round about it; and reigned therein twenty yeeres as an absolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is said to haue bene a poore Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better, before such time they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Phileterus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his aduantage of the dissention, betwene Seleuchus Calinicus and Antiochus Tetrav, the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes, and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gaules that serued vnder his Enemy, he used a pretty deuice. He wrote the word *Victory vpon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off; and when the hot liner of the beast that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainly foreshewing that the gods would be assistant in that Battaille.

After this victory, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleucus: who neuer durst attempt to recouer from him, by Warre, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty yeeres, he died by a surfeit of ouer-much drinke, and left his kingdome to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Phileterus. Attalus was an vndertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grievously molested by Acheus, who setting vp himselfe as king against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his owne City of Pergamus: but by the helpe of the Teosage, a nation of the Gaules, whom he called ouer out of Thrace, He recouered all that he had lost. When these Gaules had once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters, or interposed themselves, without inuitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his war against Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they neuertheless within a while after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victory; and used it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing, they occupied the Region about Hellespont: where in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuertheless, presuming afterwards vpon their strength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus, than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill vp the Armies of those, that could best hyre them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such, as had saued themselves and their Prouinces, in the shortfull reigne of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, sister vnto the great king Cyrus. Their Countrey was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the son of that king, whom Perdiccas.

Predicus crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuill warres among themselves; recovered his dominion, and passed it ouer to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; & are said to haue issued from the royall house of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians deriued themselves from Pylamenes, a king that assisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselves vnto the times, were alwaies conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bythynia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, hauing other employment, they were the lesse molested. Calanus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Country; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that madethem somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom we haue already sometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Towne of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias, King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, Philip grows hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred vpon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

P*rusias* as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatness he suspected. He therefore strengthened himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip, as Attalus, on the contrary side, entered into a strict Confederacie with the Etolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Etolian warre, and was deuising with Antiochus about sharing betweene them two the Kingdom of Egypt, wherein Ptolomie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a young childe his heire, the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and bestow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor iust matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came, as one that could not well deny to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilest he lay at the siege, from the Rhodians, and diuers other States: intreating him to forsake the enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answers: making shew as if he would condescend to their request, when he intended nothing lesse. At length he got the Towne: where, euen in presence of the Embassadors, of whose sollicitation he had seemed so regardfull, hee omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby hee rendred himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his fact was detested of the Rhodians, who had made vehement intercession for the poore Ciani; and were aduertised by Embassadors of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howsoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as soone as he listed: yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodians, He was contented to giue it ouer. And by this his clemency, the Embassadors said, that he would manifest vnto the world, what slanderous tongues they were; which noysed abroad such reports, as went of his falshood and oppression. Whilest the Embassadors were declaring at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked & destroyed the Town of Cios, and, after a cruell slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despite, no lesse were the Etolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia & Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this king. But most of all others was Attalus moued with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, & of his own estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had already, as a new king, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberality the loue of the Ath-nians, which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, hauing lost their owne. On the friendship of the Etolians hee had cause to presume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States he easily drew into a streight alliance with him; by their hatred newly contained against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends; but most of all, in the ready assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open warre. It had beene vnseasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemy tended; since his desire to fasten vpon Asia was manifest, and his falshood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driuen to runne his owne shippe on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admirall of the Rhodians took his death wound: and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie; by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the wracks vpon the shoare: Yet forasmuch as he had suffered far greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemy: and since he durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and wonne some Townes in Caria: whether only in a brauery, and to despight his opposites; or whether vpon any hopefull desire of conquest, it is vncertain. The stratageme, by which he wonne Prinassus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the earth so stony, that it resisted his worke; he neuertheless commanded the Pioners to make a noyse vnder ground; and secretly in the night-time he raised great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the work went maruellously forward. At length he sent word to the Town-men, that by his vnder-mining, two acres of their wall stood onely vpon wooden proppes, to which if he gaue fire, and entered by a breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prinassians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise vp those heapes which they saw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-faced, and gaue vp the Towne as lost, which the Enemy had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste back into Macedon, whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against Philip. The Athenians vpon slight cause, proclaime warre against Philip; moued thereto by Attalus; whom they slitter. Philip winnes diuers Townes: and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Ambassadors. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

These Asiaticque matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet serued well to make a noyse in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making warre in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Eastern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greeks were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece euer since the reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturalls; yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had beene most beholding vnto him, were neuertheless weary of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: especially since the diuisions of the Country were such, that every petty Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe, without much regarding the generality. But the poore Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that grieuous war with Hannibal: where in they had giuen by Loane to the Republike, all their money: neither had they as yet receiued, neither did they receiue vntill fifteene or sixteene yeeres after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present mony, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest a while; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadours to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that solicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Islands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong either of himself, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Ætolians their good friends, (and in a manner) his owne protested enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrue by intermedling in the affaires of those that were more mighty than himselfe. He was too vnskillfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new enemies. And hee found them such, as hee deserued to haue them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harme. It behooued him therefore, either to haue strained his forces to the vtmost in making warre vpon them; or in desisting from that iniurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs so past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlesse they thinke themselves iustly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly persuaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can be held inuiolable, saue onely * by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it binds one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparant, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) be presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hearkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was the Riuer of Stryx dyed vp: and then could they sweare as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne felues, euen by their good swords, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sepater into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, tooke state vpon them neuertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainly said to bee auailable vnto felicitie after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparant, that they came into the place by meere error, not thinking to haue there in done amisse; yet, as it had beene for some haynous crime, they were put to death. All their Country-men at home took this in ill part; and fought to reuenge it as a publike iniurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence a great booty. This indignitie stirred vp the high-minded Athenians, and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had ability to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadours to king Attalus, gratulating his happy successe against Philip, and intreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because he vnderstood that the Roman Embassadors, hauing about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom hee had much friendly conference: they reioycing that he continued enemy to Philip; & he being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wiues and children; in as solemne a pompe as they could deuise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the the Romans that were with him, in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obsequance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first comming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe, saying, That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which hee studied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that hee should deliuer in writing, what he would haue to be propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip; lastly, an exhortation vnto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest he with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing & ready to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, he protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little intreatie: for they were as willing to proclaim the warre, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part, Attalus and the Rhodians taking all vpon them. But while these were vainely mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their partie: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip wonne the Townes of Maronea and Aenus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellespont, he laid siege vnto Abydus; and wonne it, though he was faine to stay there long. The towne held out, rather vpon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it selfe against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither onely one Quadrirème Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men; farre too weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken to much vpon them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Æmilius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptolomie Eusphanes king of Egypt, to acquaint him with their victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians, as also to thank him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that war; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptian king was now in the third or fourth yeere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philopater had done before him) he beganne a very yong boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, that out of Egypt they had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of Extreame Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Prouinces vnable to relieue them. This message could not but be welcome to the Egyptian: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Councell for him, should offer to supply the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leisure and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmilius the yongest of them should steppe aside, & visite Philip, to try if he could make him leaue the siege of Abydus; which else he was like to carry. Æmilius, comming to Philip, tels him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, vpon whom he made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the towne of Abydus, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependance vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made warre vpon him: and that he did only requite them with the like. Doe you also (said Æmilius) requite these poore Abydians with such terrible warre, for any like Inuasion by them first made vpon you? The King was angry to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore hee roundly made answer to Æmilius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (above all) your being a Roman, that maketh you thus presumptuous. But I would wish you to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keepe it, if ye doe otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Towne immediately yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euery one of them, and set their Towne on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions. But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Gouvernours and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution, and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which whilest they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the town; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

to

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THis calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently embarke himselfe for Italie; whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five moneths, but in the short space of five dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africk; to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Country. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleue, that this war with the Macedonian was both iust and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hastened away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, & all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were giuen to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancie (as was said) in not changing their faith at such time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greeke Town, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Eastern parts, had reason to giue thanks vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntrue suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to giue them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbors; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheless as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might haue argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the Riuer of Apfus, betweene Dyrrachium & Apollonia, there beganne the Warre. Soone vpon his comming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craved his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilest hee was farre from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them.

them. For which cause he sent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces hee retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: onely some Rauiers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Euboea, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vsed to take their shippes and spoyle their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two townes. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than war-like Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arriual of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserued them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had been wont, in ancient times, to undertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make war vpon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their owne.

The Towne of Chalcis in Euboea, taken and sacked by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprize: wasteth the Country about, and makes a iourney into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, and his wife. Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Achaeans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoyleth againe: and provides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Aetolians into the Warre.

Philip returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to giue him entertainment, or perhaps before hee had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: he receiued aduertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the warre, and make his owne employment better. Hee grew soone weary of sitting as a Scarre-crow, to saue the Athenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The town of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand; and more negligently by the Towne-men, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius hauing aduertisement, sailed thither by night, for feare of being descryed: and arriuing there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. Hee voyled no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse he should haue left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) Hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all provisions for Warre, which were plentifully filled. Neither were He and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their shippes, & with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned; but, to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in pieces the Statuaries to him there erected. This done, they hastened away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be ioyfully welcomed. The king lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whether when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter, yet he made all haile to take reuenge. He thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, busie at worke in ransacking the town, and loading themselves with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed foot hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to bury the dead, Hee marched from thence away speedily toward Athens; thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post had stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descryed him a farre off, and swiftly carried word of his approach.

to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Cittadell to sound the Alarme, and with all speede made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who seeing the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation vsuall in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his coming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compass about by sea, and had no cause of haste) yet hauing in the towne some mercenary Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of citizens; they aduentured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The king was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. Hee therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that sight hee gaue singular prooffe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But he retired without harme taking; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vse their casting weapons against him, without much indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the city. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments besides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Aegina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time to preuent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, Hee came thither to them vnto expected.

The Achæans were deuising vpon warre: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being started vp in the room of Machanidas, did greater mischiefe than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his mercenaries: and of his subiects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner vpon those that liued vnder him; and one that in his naturall condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apege was very fitly matched with him, since his dexteritie was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in fleeing their wiuers, whom she would neuer suffer to bee at quiet, till they had presented her with all their Jewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her propertie, that hee caused an Image to be made, liuely representing her; & apparelled it with such costly garments as she vsed to weare. But it was indeed an Engine, seruing to torment men. Heereof hee made vse, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfait Apege stood, and there vse all his art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with excuses; then tooke he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apege (who sat by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So he ledde him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes; as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes; and herewith she griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouvernement. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Ætoliens, as Machanidas and Lycargus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopemenus vertue he stood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achæans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a furrer worse Captaine, was their Prætor; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopemenus being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloued occupation of Warre; then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their own safety in the Townes.

Against

Against this Tyrant the Achæans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of Souldiers euery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he along would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilst he made warre vpon Lacedæmon, He ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, & some Companies into the Ile of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his deuice; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans: Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis, he brake vp the Assembly, with euery mans good liking; whereas in former times, he had bene thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achæans. Neuertheless he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had bene doing what harme he might vnto the Countrey. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauen of Pyreus, and euen the citie of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into euery of these places; that he could no more than wreake his anger vpon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So hee destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe bene masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did he onely pull all downe: but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be vsuall to their reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon: & there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbors, which were likely to infect him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætoliens: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the Riuer of Apfus. Thence hee sent forth Apusius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon: Apusius tooke sundry Castles and Townes; vsing such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vntill they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoyle, he was charged in Rere, vpon the passage of a brooke, by Ashe-nagoras a Macedonian captaine: but the Romans had the better, & killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in safety at their camp. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the son of Serdilaidas the Illyrian; Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That he would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countrey lay betweene the Ætoliens and Thessalie, might be perhaps auailable with the Ætoliens, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set vpon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romans, & Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and said: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betweene his master and the Ætoliens: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended only to the defence of the Ætoliens, and yet notwithstanding had been angry, that the Ætoliens, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so buſie, in obſcuring their protection vpon thoſe that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which theſe Barbarians bore vnto the Greeks. For euen after the ſame ſort had they lent their help to the Mamertines; and afterwards deliuered Syracuſe, when it was oppreſſed by Carthaginian tyrants, but now both Syracuſe & Meſſana, were ſubiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the ſame effect he alledged many examples; adding, That in like ſort it would happen to the Aitolians: who if they drew ſuch maſters into Greece, muſt not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to conſult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would caſe them of this care, & ſend them ſuch a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rome to Syracuſe. Wherefore he concluded, that it was beſt for them, whileſt as yet they might, and whiſt one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occaſion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeers agoe made the peace which ſtill continued; although that the very ſame Romans be euen againſt it, who fought to breake it now. It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good anſwer to theſe obiections. For the Macedonian had ſpoken the very truth, in ſhewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with ſuch importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were ſet on by them to ſpeake next: who had ſtore of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. Theſe affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embaſſadour, to cal the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne king had, in few daies paſt, made Warre vpon the gods themſelues, by deſtroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pittifull rehearſall of their owne calamities: and ſaid, that if Philip might haue his will, Aitolians, and all the reſt of Greece, ſhould feele the ſame that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it ſelfe, together with Atimeneſa, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were liketo haue felt, if the walles and the Roman armes had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They said, that they had of late made Warre in the *Ætoli*ans behalfe, and that the *Ætoli*ans had without their consent made peace: whereof since the *Ætoli*ans must excuse themselves, by alledging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to give them aide convenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the *Ætoli*ans to take part with them in their war and victory, vnlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their help ere it was desired, were themselves carried vnto the warre by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue bene the cause, why Dorymachus the Aetolian Prator shifted them off a while with a dilatorie answer: though he told his Country-men, That by referring themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That ouer-much haste was an enemy to good counsaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, Hee passed a Decree, That the Prator might at anytime call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude upon this business; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was unlawfull to treat of such affaires, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were holden at set times.

6. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders: The Aetolians invade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman fleet.

Philip was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Aetolians. Hee thought them heereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Persens, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians;

Dardanians; hauing with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his Army. It was iudged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how yong-fower, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies, by making them at least beleecue, that hee was not weakely attended. And this may haue bene the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Æolia by his father, whom earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heracleides, would serue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by Sea, when the Kings backe was turned; whotooke his iourney Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

10 The Armies met in the Countrey of the Deffaretij, a people in the vtmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candavia; that running along from Hæmus in the North vntill they ioynē in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which hee had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was so that the king was vnwilling to hazzard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Fer-
10 seus with his Companies, to increasē his owne forces: yet being no lesse vnwilling to losē too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would haue fought. Hee had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein hee bestowed as many as hee thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains to prouoke out the Romans to fight, instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themselves respectiue, as oportunitie should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, hauing fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue sustained some notable detriment, if the kings directions had bene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so hotly, that they draue him to an hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger, dis-30 couered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the king had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therfore presented the second time; leading forth his Army, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kinde of help which the Romans had neuer vsed before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about fourescore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to asslight the Romans, who had neuer scene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilest possibly some were yet aliue, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks haue none. Philip had 40 patience to let the Consul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater need to fight, than hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to losē time: neither could he, without great danger, lying so neere the Enemy, that was strong in Horse, send his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he remoued eight miles off: presuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on euē ground; and so the more boldly hee suffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrey. The king was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: euē till their presumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them carelesse. When this was come to passe, hee tooke all his horse, and light-armed foot, with which hee occupied 50 a place in the mid-way, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There hee stayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them vpon the king and his companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went:

went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diuided themselves, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canuassing the field, tooke their raske where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disaduantage, as coming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might haue bene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an haruest, he was too greedily about a poore gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne safetie. They ran which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are seldom heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Mari-thes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had hee bene cast away, if a louing subject of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was ouertaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improuident rashnes; and the Consul, with as much dulnesse, for his dayes seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the king from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needs haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought vnlikely, That if the Romans following the king, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as hee fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might haue wonne it. But that Noble Historian, Linie, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay safe in his Campe; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe, he was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Persus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might set the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose hee sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vse; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for euery ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruiceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrows were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by slingeing of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consull some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for feare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Army; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to waite vpon them home; whilest he himselfe went against the Ætoliens. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætoliens, who had refused himselfe and his Nation vnto the cunct of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & againe: as also that Pleuratus & the Dardanians were fallen vpon Macedonia; grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had bene wife. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaime warre, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made inuasion vpon Thessaly. They tooke and cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay disperfed, was like to haue taken their Camp; if Aminander, more warie than the Ætoliens, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time; the Roman Fleet, assisted by Assalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Ægean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Isle of Eubœa; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen vnto Assalus, after the same Compact that had formerly bene made with the Ætoliens: the goods therein found were giuen vnto the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

S. XII.

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. warre of the Gaules in Italy. An Embassy of the Romans to Carthage, Masaniissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

Thus the time ranne away: and P. Villius a new Consul, tooke charge of the warre in Macedonia. He was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand; hauing serued long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Cannæ: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing bene long absent from Italy; whither faine they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedonia. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the History of his yeere is lost: whereof the misse is not great, since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we finde in Linie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Linie himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Author; we may reasonably beleuee, that Villius his yeere was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could haue bene expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had bene able to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saved her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that staid behinde Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behooued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps lest the message might seeme otherwise to haue sauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitiue Slaues belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and downe in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored back to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masaniissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masaniissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing bene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemy, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadors, vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him, and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite; requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadors, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans buied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules: they laid siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should haue the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his Subiects, by punishing a bad Counsaillour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Achæans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedon, taking a iourney (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arriued at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans begin to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage against Philip. Thessaly wrested by Philip, the Romans, and Etolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip deliues Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romans had not bene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemy, as soone as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they began to learne of the subtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted,* many yeeres after this, vnto priuat men, for part of those moneys that had bene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerse from the Macedonian warre; and had thereby driuen the Senators, greedily of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse need to relie vpon their Confederates. So they leuied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselues to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some iealousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it vn-courteously, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarquable. They said, That it was not their manner to vse the ayde of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to afford it; That

That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an attonement betwene them. In such louing fashion did they now carry themselues, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these termes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the supply decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had serued in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his coming hee presently discharged) & king Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the riuer of Apsus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seek their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and bene forced to retorne backe without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountaines, which diuided the South of Epirus from Thessaly, then should they enter into a plentifull Countrey; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a maner) part of his kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuerthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the Riuer of Apsus, running along through that valley which alone was open betwene the Mountaines, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assayed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; he was compelled to sit stil, without doing any thing for the space of forty daies.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the war might bee ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that hee and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the iniuries, which he had done to many people in his late warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had bene long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, hee thought it against all reason, that hee should relinquish his clayme and dominion ouer them. He also said, That as farre forth as it should appeare that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoever, hee could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the iudgement of some free State, that had not bene interested in those quarrells. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no iudgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies been the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Towns, that he would haue to be set at libertie; the first that he named were the Thessalians: These had bene subiects (though conditionally) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer since the daies of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians, the king in a rage demanded what sharper condition hee would haue laid vpon him, had hee bene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul stroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolue what course to take: there came to him an Heards-man sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beasts in those Mountaines; was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vndertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound:

bound : and being promised a great reward, in case hee made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They traualled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discouered. When they had recouered the hill-tops, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscouered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilest these were on their iourney, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent, hee pressed as neere as he could vnto the Enemies Campe, and assailed them in their strength. He preuailed as little as in former times, vntill the shoutings of those that ran downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himselfe. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him : hee made a stand at the end of fiew miles, and gathered there together his broken troups, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and prouisions : if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians began to stand in feare, lest being driuen from a place of such aduantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, vpon equall ground. Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hastie retreat hee could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrie, carying away with them as much as they were able, and spoyling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their king) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to vse any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grieuously, that he was driuen to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrie, which had euer been well affected vnto him : so that a little hinderance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his kingdome of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were euen in a readinesse to invade Thessaly; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their severall Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans : they foreslowed not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while : but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their haruest, could not finde enough to maintaine his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to auoyde. T. Quintius wonne Phaleria by assault : Metropolis and Piera yeelded vnto him. Rhage⁴⁹ he besieged : and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recollected his spirits, honored about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing well-neere spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Italian Towne of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth : which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conueniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wonne by assault : many were yeelded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space hee had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wonne two Cities in Eubrea; and afterward laid siege vnto Cenchree, an Haven and Arcenall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprize did somewhat helpe forward the Achæans, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip : since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; & that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be readred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Achæans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had beene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilest being intangled in a dangerous warre, hee wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himselfe their absolute Lord : His poysoning of Aratus their old Gouvernour : His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants : together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to hold him as a necessarie euill, euen whilest they were vnable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopemen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend : then did they only thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that hee was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceiue how they stood affected : and therefore hee sent murderers, to take away the life of Philopemen. But failing in this enterprise; and being detected, hee did thereby only set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopemen wrought so with the Achæans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian. Cycliades, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristarchus chosen Prætor, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadors were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Achæans, making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achæans was held at Sycion, to deliberate and resolute in this weightie case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Achæans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom hee had also sent for this busines, admonishing the Achæans of their Alliance with the king, & of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassador, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Achæans to vnderstand, That hee, who could bee satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell, who remembring the benefites of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; preuailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which hee, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this warre. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into societie : with the Romans (because no League would bee of force, vntill the Senate and people had approoued it) they forbore to decree any societie at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argiues, hauing done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honesty thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argiues had so little thanke, that all the rest of the Achæans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solemne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discomredit selfe so plainly, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philoctes, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which hee had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude ready to follow him, He easily compelled the Achaean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation; so they gave him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie, windest as yet with his honour he might seeke it; and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly be chosen, who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselfe; and therefore thought best, since more could not be done, to pre-dispose things vnto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Larian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulfe of Saron, in the Aegean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamian; an Ambassador of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes, and some Agents for the Aetolians and Achaeans. Philip had with him some few of his own Captaines, and Cycladius, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. Here refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal Gods; yet misdoubting some treacherie in the Aetolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans, were, That he should set all Cities of Greece at libertie; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewise whatsoeuer he held of theirs in Illyria; and whatsoeuer about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and spoyled in the late warre betweene them: The Rhodians would haue againe the Countrie of Peraz, lying ouer against their Iland, as also that he should withdraw his Garrisons, out of diuers Townes about the Hellespont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achaeans desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniustly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their consents. The Aetolians took vpon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leauing it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatsoeuer he held that had at any time bene theirs. Neither would they herewithall content; but insolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaly; corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by bestowing, when hee was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Aetolians, Philip commanded his Gallies to be rowed neerer the shore. But they began to plie him afresh: telling him, that hee must obey his betters, vnlesse hee were able to defend himselfe by force of Armes. He answered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing) with sundry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul vnderstand, what manner of companions these Aetolians were. For hee said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise the best of the Greeks; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take spoyle from spoyle: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Aetolia out of Aetolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as warre happened betweene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by sending voluntaries to serue on both sides; that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece, He said it was strange that the Aetolians should bee so carefull thereof, since diuers Tribes of their owne, which hee there named, were indeed no Grecians: wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romans would giue him leaue to make slaues of those Aetolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat smiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Aetolians well railed vp; touching whom hee began to vnderstand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that generall demand of setting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatnesse of the Romans; though hee would also consider, what might be seeme his owne dignitie. But that the Aetolians, Rhodians, and other pettie Estâtes, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might hee should be thereunto compelled: it was, hee said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Achaeans hee charged with much ingratitude; receiving against them some Decrees of their owne, wherein they had laden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Neuerthelesse he said, that he would render Argos vnto them; but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himselfe.

Thus

Thus he addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall, vnto whom if he could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late war, (hee said) was onely defensue; they hauing bene the offerers; or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, he had cut downe the Grove, and pleasant walks thereabouts: what could he doe more, than send Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus he iested the matter out; but offered neuerthelesse, in honour of the Romans, to giue back the Region of Peraz to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and hee ill provided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being so ill provided of Counsaile, said Titus, you may euen thanke your selfe; as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the weightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolue. But it was beleueed, that hee thereby sought to abridge the Aetolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would giue the Achaeans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Aetolians, that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the king were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, he would suffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the king intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendred; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome, where he would referre himselfe to the courtesie of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintus would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consull might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the warre. So he easily preuailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in warre or peace. Further hee willed them to send their severall Embassadors to Rome, which intimating vnto the Senate, what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest he perswaded King Aminander, to make a journey to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his own Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadour of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vnder-taking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer be effected, vnlesse especiall care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, & Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrey, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruilitie, that the Senate agreed to haue it euen so as they desired. When therfore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to haue made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the midst of their Preface, with this one demand: whether their Master would yeeld up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors haue truly said, That neither the Aetolians, Achæans, nor any of their fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis & Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Townes? As for Coriath, whereto the Achæans had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain vnto an Other.) Philip had already condescended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue bene alleged, euen against the Greekes, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintus his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a successeur had bene decreed vnto him. But since he was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to giue care vnto any talke of peace.

King

Philip, seeing that his Achæans had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common Enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedæmonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had bene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians & Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achæans: and therefore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be wonne. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be consigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tye him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philocles the kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a straight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vntill by decree of the Citizens themselves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argiues: but found them so averse, that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to robbe and fleece them. So hee willed Philocles, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which he was ready to receiue. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argiues: who for very loue had forsaken the Achæans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staid behinde, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Siluer. Also a great imposition of money was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more adoe. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or played the theecus, in purloining their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude; atrogating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath bene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintus, and offered to ioine with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Roman six hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also he agreed with the Achæans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the finall conclusion of peace betwene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

6. XIII.

The battaile at Cyncephala, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintus.

Thus Quintus, as soone as hee vnderstood that hee was appointed to haue Command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwards wholly to relieue himselfe.

Titus had in his Army about sixe and twenty thousand; and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessaly, and thereupon addressed himselfe to seek him out. Things had like to haue met vnauayes, neere vnto the Citie of Phere: where the vane-curriers on both sides discouered each other; and sent word thereof vnto their severall Captaines. But neither of them were ouer hasty, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred horse, with as many light armed foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their severall Campes, with little advantage vnto either side. The Country about Phere was thicke set with Trees; and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles, which made it vnproper for serue of the Macedonian Rhaden. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remove backe into Scopula in the Frontier of Macedon, where he might be plentifully serued with all necessaries. Titus conceiued aright his meaning; and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were hee loonly to waste the Country. There lay betwene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neither the less they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where hee found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discouersers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip soon set in such strong supply, that the resistance of the Aetolians had not bene desperate, the Romans being followed had bene driven backe into their Campes. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians preuailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their horse, to animate those which were in fight. It was altogether besides the kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him quick and suddenly, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his owne. If hee could vse an occasion, the like whereof he should not often finde. This caused him to alter his purpose: in so much as he embayled his men, and climbed up those hills, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called by a word signifying as much, Cyncephala. As soone as he was on the hill-top; hee did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were backe in fight, almost at the very Camp of the Enemies, whom they had repelled so farre. Hee had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serue best his advantage; for as much as the Romans were quick driven from all parts of the hill. But of this commoditie hee could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those Dog heads, as they were called, leauing nothing asly for his Philip. Nevertheless hee found conuenient room, wherein to march a little on part of his Army, and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the rest, vntill hee should see the day might. While hee was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature began to drinke; as being faine vpon the Roman Legions, by four hundred of them were driven to recoyle. He sent forward to helpe them, and they no lesse hastily drew vnto him for a succour, hauing the Romans not farre behind them. Hee sent forth a great number of his light armature, to charge the Romans, and to charge the Romans. Here they found an extremely difficult piece of of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vsed, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together vndissolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points aduanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if the Romans gaue back: euery one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it, was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obserued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vneuenness of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) vpon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the worke, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against these ill-ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as hauing no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeed if they should haue done their best, it could not haue serued; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnuessfull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing fixe and twenty thousand in his Armie (as hee is said to haue bene equall to the Enemy in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine foureteen thousand Pikes, whereof he himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, at they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing vsually sixtene in File, must, when it consisted of seven thousand, haue well-neere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might bee cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to euery man of them three foote of ground: this Front must haue occupied twelue hundred Foote, or two hundred and fortie paces; that is, very neere a quarter of a myle in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessitie disioyne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not euery where to bee found. Here at Cynoscephalæ Philip had so much roome, as would only suffice for the one halfe of his men; the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming vp vnto them; nor found any difficulty in murthering those enemies, whose feete were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to giue backe; and the comming on of the Legions, to berake themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainly helpfull to making of the victory complete. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on so farre: as that himselfe with his fellowes, in mounting the hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand: and making downe the hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindermost ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed, since the first fight, were accustomed, when the battells came to ioyning, to carry their pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconuenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it serued neither for offence nor defence, except onely in front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when hee was to fight with Darius in Melopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the fore sides of it were as to many fronts looking sundrie wayes, wayes, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet is it to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsual forme; as also at the same time hee embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexander's men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keepe their owne ground, not being able to follow vpon the Enemy, vnlesse their hindmost ranks could haue marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselves, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The king himselfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euery where alike; and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when hee beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; He presently betook himselfe to flight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except only a small while about Tempe, there to collect such as were dispersed in this ouerthrow) vntill he was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about seuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and five thousand taken prisoners.

§. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Aetolians, and grants truce vnto Philip, with conditions, vpon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed vnto the Greekes. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

The Aetolians wonderfully vaunted themselves; and desired to haue it noysed through all Greece, that the victory at Cynoscephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilest the Romans were buied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glorie, and at their rauencous condition; purposed to teach them better manners; by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceiued, That by vsing them with any extraordinary fauour, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Aetolians much more vehemently, than euery they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battaile Titus made hast vnto Larissa, a citie of Thessalie: which he presently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduersitie, he forgot not to provide for the safety of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceiue, that he gaue them as already lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their Neighbors, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the town of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet: and very soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Aetolians euer true to Philip, gaue vp themselves vnto the Romans, hearing of the victory at Cynoscephalæ. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Perce, a Region of the Continent ouer against the Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treaty of Peace. They did beerein more manly, than any other of the Greeks: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, & some helpe which they borrowed of the Achæans & other their friends gaue battell to Dinocrates the kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the victory, & consequently recovered the whole Prouince. It angered Philip worse than all this, that the Rhodians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdome, wasting and spoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Army in all hast of sixe thousand foot and five hundred horse: wherewith comming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise He had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yeeld vnto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Lamachus and Demosthenes, with with Cleodemus the banished Athenian, in whom he reposed much confidence, and advisors vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in priuie, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels; by whom they were gently entertained; and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto him a Truce for fiftene dayes: in which time, the king himselfe might come and speake with the Roman General. In the mean season many suspicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the king, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chiefe authors; who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honestie, where profited them a wrong way, judged alike of all men to elfe. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters vnto his Associates; willing them to haue their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Fempe, where the Treaty should bee held. There when they were assembled, they entred into consultation before the kings arrival; what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, & for euery state in particular. The speaking Aminander besought them all, & especially the Romans, that they would thinke vpon him; and considering his weakenesse which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus for so much as he had thus assembled the Confederates to aduise vpon their own good, and had willed them to deliuer their minds freely; added; That in the matter of the purpose which he had in hand, he was utterly deterred: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he said, none other end to be had of the warre, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate & people of Rome, or with the faire promises made by Titus himselfe vnto the Greeks; than the chasing of Philip quite out of his kingdom. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered; That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held; for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seek the utter destruction of any king, or Nation; at such times as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessity, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was onely an inuolvement to moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece: it was (he said) expedient, that the kingdom of Macedonia should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be utterly destroyed: forasmuch as it ferued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other salvage Nations, which would soon ouerflow the whole continent of Greece, if this kingdom were not interposed. Wherefore, he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, hee had with him had pressed him in the former Treaty, then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Ætolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure; to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phanias, another of the Ætolians, to say, that all was come to nothing; for that once long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no lesse than he had done in the before. But Titus interrupted him, & bid him leaue his babbling; saying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip were hee neuer so desirous, should thenceforth not haue it in his power to molest the Greeks; as he had done in the before.

The next day King Philip came thither, whom Titus receiued friendly; and suffering him to repose himselfe that night in the Countesse the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had bene required at his hands; offering yet further to waite the good pleasure of the Senate; if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phanias the Ætolian, insulting ouer him; said it was to bee hoped, that he would then let length giue up to the Ætolians, a number of townes, which hee had named, bidding Titus speake whether he would, or no. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himselfe, said it should bee otherwise; There were Ætolian townes, and should be all free of them duly excepted, which hee had long agoe had referred to committe selfe to the faith of the Romans; & therefore should now be giuen to the Ætolians. Hereat Phanias cried out, that it was a great iniury, vnto the Ætolians, that the Townes that had sometime belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Couenant betwene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing saue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had bene such a condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderstand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the towne in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subiection of the Ætolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted, with these angry passages between the Roman and the Ætolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalf of those Thessalians, to giue them liberty, though they had stood out against him, euen till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

Townes

The chiefe cause that moued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alleaged; was, the same of Antiochus his coming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right: For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alleging frivolous matter of their owne suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betwene the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to what soeuer was demanded, and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side, and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the king would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People, by whose soueraigne authority it was concluded, that Peace should be granted vnto the king. So tenne Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had bene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, that Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine haue retained those three important Cities, of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Achæans; and all the other Greeke towne which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Isthmian Games, He should withdraw his garrisons out of all the Greeke towne which he held, and consigne them ouer to the Romans: That he should deliuer vnto them all Captiues that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of warre, reseruing to himselfe onely fise of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatnesse, wherein sixteene men laboured at euery oare: Further, that he should pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres following, by euen portions. Hereto Linie adds, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedonia, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already deliuered to Titus, together with his yonger son Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as yong Demetrius, who, together with those foure hundred talents, was giuen for hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias king of Bythynia: giuing him to vnderstand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoyled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bythynian his son-in-law, should be restored to liberty, & permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their nation did. What effect effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly materiall; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece reioyced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Aetolians found themselves agreed that they were utterly neglected; which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Boeotians continued to fauour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor, which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to haue a hand in the execution, yet neuertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselves vndiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoeuer they durst not take Armes against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Country. This was detected within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Boeotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands; and for five hundred soldiers, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which hee would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadors to the Achæans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserued. Herewithall he falls to wasting their Country; and besiegeth two such townes of theirs, as did seeme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Achæans and Athenians, (especially of the Achæans, who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet besought him rather to grant peace vnto the Boeotians) preuailed so far with him; that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them reioycing that they were free from the Macedonian, others greatly doubting that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Aetolian would haue been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greeks, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre serued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to bee reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumours, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnity and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect. That the Senate and people of Rome, & Titus Quintius Flaminius the General, hauing vanquished king Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their own Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achæans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Thessalians, & Perrhæbians. The suddenness of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their owne eares. The Greeks were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thanks; which they rendered now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-neer smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more auailable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hagesanax and Lyfias, king Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with warre: as also to restore whatsoeuer he had occupied, belonging to the kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreouer they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe ouer his Army into Europe;

adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning those points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greeks; to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gaue vnto the Aetolians, whom they thought it no wisdom to offend ouermuch, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Thessalians, all saue the town of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had beene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Aetolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Aetolians contended very earnestly about Pharfalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and reiected vnto the Senate: for howsoeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Achæans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea; so the Corinthians were made free and iudged (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Common wealth, enjoyed their liberty in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Antiochus were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this warre; to reigne in them & the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had bene their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oream and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubœa, to his sonne and successor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Subiects, should be suffered to enioy their libertie. Orestis, a little Prouiue of the kingdom of Macedonia, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeelded vnto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These busineses being dispatched: it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to auoid the warre with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and propriety. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrel, and about vnto others, to prae-dispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this king the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Warres of the Romans with ANTI OCHVS the Great, and his Adherents.

S. I.

What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolomie, reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race, king of Asia and Syria, dyed in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is said) beett warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos; as the fatall place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath bene preserued, or any mischief auoyded, by the predictions of such Diuellish Oracles. Rather I beleene, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue beene antedated by their Priests or by others, which deuised them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearly beloued of his Father; who surrendred vnto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnderstood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomy Ceraunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vniuengeled by this his Successor. But

But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with faire words, containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ceramus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the blood of Selenus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queene Stratonice in his Fathers life; yet out of modesty he forbore to imbrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should haue vrged him. Afterwards hee had warres with Antigonius Gonatus, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutarius and Leontinus; Kings or Captaines of the Gauls, were set vpon him by the same Nicomedes. With these hee fought a great battaile: wherein though otherwife the Enemies had all aduantage against him, yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he won the Victory. He tooke in hand an enterprize against Ptolomie Philadelphus: but finding ill success in the beginning, he soon gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Strabus the Chaldean dedicated his History of Assyria; the same, which hath since been excellently falsified by the Frier Annus. Hee left behinde him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the king of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeer of the kingdom of the Greekes, when he had reigned nineteene yeeres.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vaine and impious title giuen to him, by flattery of the Milesians; whom he deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. Hee held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolomie Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierome and other Interpreters haue vnderstood that Prophecie of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South, shall come to the king of the North, to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolomie Philadelphus was a great loue of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arifnoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoeuer, the worst of all that race. It was He, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, He sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly bene very great: for he had set at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slavery throughout all Egypt; and hee had sent vnto the Temple of God in Ierusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yeelding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolomie caused to be translated into Greek, by seuentie two of the most graue & learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seuentie, Iesus the sonne of Syrach, is thought by Genbrard to haue bene one: who that he liued in this Age, it seemes to me very sufficiently proued by Iansenius, in his Preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this businessse between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as Iosephus affirms) by Aristaus that was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolomie Philadelphus was king; reckoning the time wherein he ioyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had bene in his former yeeres: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to liue for euer. If this had bin referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue stood with reason: otherwife, the Gowne, with which he was oftentroubled, was enough to teach him his owne error. Hee was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also of his Off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomie. After his second marriage, he vsed his first wife with no better regard, than if she had bene his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet aduencured not to seeke reuenge, vntill her owne sonne Selenus Callinicus was of ability to be king. This was two or three yeeres after the death of Ptolomie Philadelphus: at what time she poysoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Selenus her son, murdered together with a sonne whom she had borne to Antiochus, in the same manner, than Antiochus had done with the young Prince her child; a while after the said Librarie at Daphne; and that our owne sonne Callinicus, of this name, prepared to succceede her brother Antiochus King of Egypt, came to the world with an Antiochus, though too late, for the world had bene full of Antiochus before. As for Antiochus, hee was a wicked man, and a wicked nature; which they did couer in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would haue bene as much endangered, if Ptolomie Philadelphus, who came against him, had not bene drawne backe into his owne Countrey, by some Commotions there in hand. For that he wrote nothing that would haue bin against Ptolomie, in defence of their wrongs; but rather they sided with the Egyptian, who took Laodice and her kings women, then and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Antiochus, being freed from this iussion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Antiochus into Egypt; went about a dangerous peece of worke, euen to make warre vpon his owne subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as in had bin much better, by well-deferuing, to haue changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miscarrie. After this hee embarked himselfe, and putting to Sea, did meete with such a tempest, as decoured all his shippe, and a very few of his friends, that hardly escaped. This calamity, hauing left him nothing left in a manner than his naked body, turned neuertheless to his great good, as upon after it seemed. For when his Subjects vnderstood, what for the gods (as they conceiued) it had punished him for his offences; they had commiseration of his Estate, and, presuming that hee would therefore become a pious man, offered vnto him their seruice with great alacrity. This reuersed him, and filled him with such spirit, as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptian, he made ready a mighty Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had bene at Sea. Hee was vanquished by Ptolomie in a great battaile; whence hee escaped hardly, no better attended, than after his late shipwrecke. Halting therefore backe to Antiochus, and fearing that the enemy would soon be at his heeles, he wrote vnto his brother Antiochus, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed, and promising in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeeres old, but extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. Hee leuied a mighty Armie of the Gauls; wherewith he set forward to helpe his brother, or rather to get what he could for him. Hereof Ptolomie being advertised, and finding no defect but himselfe in a matter more than he needed, took Antiochus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Antiochus freed from this care of Pittie, than hee was at hand. But his Brother Antiochus came vpon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to haue the better Armie. So Antiochus was vanquished againe, and fled himselfe with few about him, that he was verily supposed to haue perished in the battaile. Thus did Gods iudice take reuenge of those murders by which the Crowne was purchased; and reuelled (as might haue bene thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was very glad to heare of his brothers death, as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were gladder than he. For when hee led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest, in the beginning of his Reigne, those perfidious Barbarians took counsaile against him, and desired how to strippe him of all that hee had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them, it would be in their power, to doe what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus, and enforced him to raise out himselfe with money, as if he had bene their lawful Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Communion with them, as ended but little to his honour. In the meane while Selenus had gathered another Armie, and prepared once more, to trie his fortune against his brother. Antiochus hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten; which is no great marvel, since hee had gathered so many of the Gauls his own soldiers, than than of the enemy with whom he had to deale. After this, Antiochus wonne much in Asia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought between the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand. And Antiochus fled to the Indus; (which surname was giuen him, because he sought his prey vpon every one; without care whether he were prouoked or not) soared away as farre as hee could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Having fetcht a great compassse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia, where his father-in-law King, Antiochus took him vp. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew, but with a meaning to betray him. This he soone perceived: and therefore, betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to beat his flight. At length he resolved to bestow himselfe vpon Ptolemy; his owne conscience telling him; what euill he had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. In fidelitie can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemy well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he layd him vp in close prison: whence though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, hee fell into the hands of the eues, by whom he was murdered. Neere about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a iourney against Aspas founder of the Parthian kingdom: where in his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him; that he was taken prisoner. Aspas dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he bracke his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappy reigne of twenty yeeres. He had to wife Laudia, the sister of Antiochus, one of his most trusty Captaiues; which was father vnto that Achæus, who making his aduantage of this affliction, became shortly after (as hee styled himselfe) a king; though rather indeede, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laudia he had two sonnes; Seleucus the third, surnamed Euergetes; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards The Great.

Seleucus Cerdanus reigned onely three yeeres, in which time he made warre vpon Antiochus the first, that was King of Pergamos. Being weake of body through sicknesse and in want of mony, he could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally hee was slaine by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturus a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Antiochus, who slue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie; which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Child.

II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reigne. Of Ptolemy Euergetes, and Philopator Kings of Egypt, warre betwene Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Molo; an expedition of Antiochus against him. The continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian warre: with the passages betwene the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemy, and Peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his rebellion; his greatnesse, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians; Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fifteene yeeres old, when hee began his reigne, which lasted sixe and thirty yeeres. In his Minoritie, He was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which inlined all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful seruants. This vild quality in a Counsellour of such great place, how harmful it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe; the successe of things will shortly discover.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemy Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heire Ptolemy Philopator, a young Boy likewise, as hath else where been remembered. This was that Euergetes, who reuenged Antiochus and the Achæans: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and lovingly entertained him, when hee was chased out of Greece by Antiochus Ghazar. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Nagid. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was giuen to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoiles which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that hee reuenged some of those those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to haue made warre vpon the Iewes, for that Antiochus their high Priest, out of meeke conuincence of mony refused to pay vnto him his yearly tribute of 200 talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Iosephus a Iew, to whom afterwards hee let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Coele Syria, with Palestina and all those parts of the Countrey that lay neere vnto Egypt, were held by the Egyptian; either as hauing salne to the share of Ptolemy the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battell at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the trouble some and vnhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betwene the Ptolemies and the Seleucids, were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemy Euergetes reigned sixe and twenty yeeres; and dyed towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Sirachides there saith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth yeere, when Euergetes was king. It may therefore be, That either this king reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty yeeres, were the yeeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did other whikes reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsaier, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptian; for the recouerie of Coele Syria, and the Countreys adioyning. This counsaile was very vnseasonably giuen, when Molo, the kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and sought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrey. Neuerthelesse Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stiffly, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captaine, other Capitaines that were faithfully, whilst He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a king. No man durst gaine say the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenatas an Achæan, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebell; whilst in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the kings expedition into Coele Syria. The king hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Deserts into the Vallie of Masfias, betwene the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus, found his way there stopped by Theodorus an Ætolian, that serued vnder Ptolemy. So he consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenatas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his whole Armie, and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilst he was yet on his iourney, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris; received many aduertisements by such as fled ouer vnto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wils, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against their king. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessity. Xenatas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meete to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place tenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenatas could not so bee stopped, Hee himselfe dislodged, and tooke his iourney towards Media; leauing all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne souldiers: or whether thereby to deceiue his enemy; the great follie of Xenatas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenatas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of vsing the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast, with the prouisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather he commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselves against the iourney, which he intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which hee had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily returne the same night. Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste backe vnto them, that he came vpon them early in the morning; whilst they were yet heavy with the wine and other good cheere, that they had spent at supper. So Xenetas and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered, without making resistance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to save their owne liues. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebells marched vnto Seleucia, which he presently tooke: and, mastering within a little while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countrey downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Persia, Hee hastened vnto Susa; where at his first comming, he won the City: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to giue order concerning this businesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marlyas; filled him with great sorrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counsaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre he had about him, to let alone this enterprize of Coelosyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This counsaile was put in execution with all conuenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soone after slaine, by the practice of Hermias, who could not endure to heare good counsaile giuen, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the iourney against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more auailable, than any oddes which he had of the Rebells in strength. Molo distrusted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good successe, nor any other consideration, would serue to hold them from returning to the kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him to assaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, Hee was discovered by some that fled ouer from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by some error, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quiered, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which he had that many would reuolt vnto him. Neither was he decelued in this his belief. For not a few men, or Ensignes: but all the left wing of the enemy, which was opposite vnto the King, changed side forthwith as soone as euer they had sight of the kings person; and were ready to doe him seruice against Molo. This was enough to haue wonne the Victorie: but Molo shortned the worke, by killing himselfe, as did also diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne swords.

After this Victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates king of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a sonne. Fortune seemed bountifull vnto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what vse he could, of her friendly disposition while it lasted: Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, He iudged it conuenient to visit his Frontiers, were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Hereunto his Counsailler Hermias gaue assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Gouvernement. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; hauing the greatest part of his kingdome, situate betwene the Caspian & Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and feareful; and therefore yielded vnto whatsoeuer conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourney Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias, informing him truly how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly vnto the kings owne life. Antiochus beleued this, hauing long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring for feare of him to vtter his suspicions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight, a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disparation. The King needed not to haue vsed so much art, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoeuer he seemed gracious whilst he was aliue: yet they that for feare had becne most obsequious to him him, whilst he were in case to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as he had deserved, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children lying then at Apamie, were stoned to death by the wiues and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outragiously, the longer that they had becne concealed.

About these times, Achens (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a king. His purpose was to haue invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprize; and studied to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achens; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew all; and vpbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be vnparadonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traytor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Coelosyria, or what else he could; of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. Hee began with Seleucia a very strong City neere to the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long hee wonne, partly by force, partly by corrupting with brybes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, where to Antigonus the great, who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonion: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Evergetes hauing lately won it, might if it had so pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemis. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue, which therefore no longer are their own; than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Aetolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Coelosyria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now grown sorry, that he had vsed so much faith & diligence, in seruice of an vnthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenarie, he began to haue regard to his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthy of these two kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus the Cities of Tyrus & Ptolemis. Whilst he was deuising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to king Antiochus: his practice was detected & he besieged in Ptolemis by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus hastning to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemis, with a good flecte of the Egyptian kings that was in those Hamens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrey, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a iourney into Egypt it selfe. Agathocles and Socibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safety of his kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the war: and neuerthelesse, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadours to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, & Cyzicus, as likewise from the Aetolians; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes, desiring to take vp the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Socibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsaillers perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victory would be their own; if they could get, for money, a sufficient number of the greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Gouvernours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier belief, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, & other Embassadours, comming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner, as being at decelued, by the cunning of Agathocles & his fellows: Antiochus therefore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not winne: & being desirous to refresh himselfe & his Armie in Seleucia, during the winter which then came on, granted to the Egyptian a truce for foure moneths, with promise that hee would be ready to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as hee would faine haue seemed, but onely to lull his enemies asleep, whilest heooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would haue vsed, He vsed himselfe, as presuming that when time of the yeere better serued, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, since Ptolemie provided not for their defence. Neuerthelesse, he gaue audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell, which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. He said, that it was agreed betwene Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonius, should bee giuen in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ipsus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargaine. They said, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Coelosyria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countreies about the Riuer of Euphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needs haue Achus comprehended in the League betwene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seek to ioyn him in Confederacie with his own Soueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a very puissant Armie, was comming vp against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the yeere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuerthelesse hee draue them: and, proceeding onward in his journey, wonne so many places, that he greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neere together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forsooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battell was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arfinoe his Sister and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deeds of his Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they been fewer would haue beaten those of Africke. Therefore by the aduantage of those beasts, hee draue the Enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein he fought himselfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his Enemies battaile, and won the victory; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field about seuentie thousand foot, and sixe thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarceten thousand foot, and not foure hundred horse; yet the same of his overthrow tooke from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Achus, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Egyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie to vex himselfe thus with the tedious businesse of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing staid three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror, to the great admiration of his subiects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achus was not comprised in the league betwene these two Kings: or if hee had beene been included therein, yet would not the Egyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby hee had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin germain to the King, as hath beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likely-hoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if hee would meddle in that quarrell betwene sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian: He was not onely slothfull; but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late expedition; beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subiection. Thus brake out a warre betwene the king and his subiects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue beene spent, as he thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achus. As for Antiochus, hee had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent vp Achus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Castle it selfe was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sawr, was in like manner situate vpon steepe Rockes, and almost inaccessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carcases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, vsed to be throwne. Now it was obserued by Lagoras, that the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hunted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vsed to flie vp vnto the top of the Rockes, and to pitch vpon the walles, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Hereof he informed the king: who approued his iudgement, & gaue vnto him the leading of such men, as hee desired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those rocks, and whilest a generall assault was made, entred the towne in that part; which was at other times vnguarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Craesus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse manie ages past; and therefore out of memorie, Achus held still the Castle: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was verie well stored with all necessaries; & manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the vnsallrediousnesse of expectation, his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians trians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still inchoed. But hee thought it not safe, to let Achaus breake loose againe. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolemie the Egyptian, and good friends vnto Achaus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appeare in the Countreyes vnder Taurus, he would soone haue an Armie at command, and bee strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receiue at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Antiochus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vnderooke the businesse: and gaue such likely reasons of bringing all to effect, that they wrote vnto Achaus, by one Arianus, a trustie messenger, whom Bolis found meane to conueigh into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achaus held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in priuie Characters, or Chiphers, where with none saue he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained deuce of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger; hee was a trustie fellow, and one whom Achaus found, by examination, heartily affected vnto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus 20 whom Bolis had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; vnder whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked vp the Castle of Sardes. Neuerthelesse other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselfe to some aduenture. When the messenger had therefore passed to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Achaus, & conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, saue onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and as all their Countrymen, some few excepted, haue beene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a consultation together, that was, as Polybius obserues it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safety of him whose deli- 30 uery they vnderooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betwene them ten Talents, which they had already receiued in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Achaus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a seruice, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad, than were the friends of Achaus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus 40 was to get vp into the Castle, and conueigh Achaus thence: Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him very priuate audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptolemie whom he had long serued; He accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At his comming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achaus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But hee discoursed so well, and with such grauity; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or iudgement. Hee was an olde Souldiour, had long beene a Captaine vnder Ptolemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. Hee had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other countryman of his, 50 who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times giuen a safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an aduenture stirred vp some diffidence. Achaus therefore dealt wisely, and sayde, That he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that hee meant to send away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom when he receiued better aduertisement, concerning the likelyhood of the enterprise, then would he issue forth himselfe. Hereby he tooke order; not to comit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he playd the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, That he had to doe with one, whose knavery could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus, That if Achaus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; & Bolis following behinde, should haue an eye vpon Achaus to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that being taken alive, Hee might be to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolis in the Rete. Achaus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Ladice; and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed foure of his special friends to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greek tongue, speaking & answering as need should require, for all, as if the rest had beene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuising vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to be mischief of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achaus, or whether Achaus himselfe were there. The way was very vncertaine, and in some places dangerous, especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in diuers places: and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon euery occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achaus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that he was the man: and so by their vnseasonable duty, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whistled, & presently clasped Achaus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus: who sat vp watching in his Pavilion, expecting the euent. The sight of Achaus, brought in bound vnto him, did so astonish the king, that he was vnable to speake a word; and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes assembling his friends together, Hee condemned Achaus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischieuous knaues against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverbe, Am traydor dos alleaños. The death of Achaus brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gaue vp the place and themselves vnto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

* Among these few I doe not except one, calling himselfe Eudemus, son to Andrews a Cretan who in one of his late shamessele lies, wherein he introduced our King, Religion, and Country, with all the good & worthy men of whom he could learne the names, hath, by inserting my name twice, belied me in calling me a Puritan, and one that haue beene dangerous vnto my Soueraigne. It is an honour to be ill spoken of by so diligent a supporter of Treasons, and Archtreason of Lies: in regard whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Cretisme no lesse voluminous, than he in multiplicity of name is beyond any the Cretians in elder times, that were alwaies Tyes, emill brasts, and slow bellies. As Polybius 54, 5.

40 Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subiect vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Prouinces, after the death of Alexander; the Gouernement ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard; shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus: vnder whose posterity they continued vntill the Reigne of Seleucus Calinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian kings: The lustfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Calinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slaine by the Gauls; did stirre vp Arfaces, a Noble man of the Countrey, to seeke reuenge of iniuries done, and animate them to rebell. So he slue the kings Lieutenant; made himselfe king of the Parthians and Lord of Hyrcania; sought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Calinicus prisoner in battaile, whom hee royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby he wonne reputation as a lawfull king: and by good gouernement of his Countrey, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his Subjects, that his name was continued vnto his successors; like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, & that of the Cesars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucidae beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an army, that that they durst not meete him in plaine field; but kept themselves in woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and passages of Mountaines. The resistance they made auailed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well fortified, as he needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods & Streights betwene their mountaines; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compasse about, might eyther get about the enemies heads; or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often employ against them his light armature: wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and glide way vnto his Phalanx, vpon which they durst not aduenture themselves in open ground. Asfages, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelity of his owne subiects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an invader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and Deserts, would haue caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to giue ouer the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out: Hee caused the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his enemy must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoiled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not preuaile, He withdrew himselfe out of the way, suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey: wherein without some victorie obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Asfages was nothing strongly provided for the war. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe City of that Prouince. This indignitie, and many other losses, caused Asfages at length, when he had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to aduenture a battaile. The issue thereof was such as gaue to neither of the kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Asfages craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subiect.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Bathydemus King of the Baſtrians; one that indeede had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but hauing gotten the kingdom from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Enthydemus hee fought a battaile by the Riuier Arius, where he had the victory. But the victory was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which he gaue of his owne priuate valour, in obtaining it. Hee was thought that day to haue demeaned him more couragiously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His horse was slaine vnder him; and he himselfe receiued a wound in his mouth, whereby he lost some of his teeth. As for Enthydemus, He withdrew himselfe backe vnto the furthermost parts of his kingdom, and afterwards protracted the warre, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed betwene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was vniuſly vsurped from him: Enthydemus answering, That he had wonne it from the children of the Vsurers: and further, That the Baſtrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, saue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Scythians, with whom if they should ioyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Prouinces that lay behinde them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Enthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father, as Embassadour in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little auailable vnto a good conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to giue him in marriage, one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Enthydemus to retaine the kingdom, causing him neuertheless to deliuer vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselfe by oath, to such Couenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Baſtrian in quiet, made a journey ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophaganeus, king of the Indians, the society that had bene betwene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subiect vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his warre against Antigonus, raised part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Westward, and was ouer-busied in a great ciuill warre: then did one Sandrocastus, an Indian, stirre vp his Countrey-men to Rebellion; making himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him, as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title hee soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maiestic of a king. Finally hee got vnto himselfe (hauing an Armie of sixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had bene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselfe, ere Seleucus Nicator could finde leisure to call him to account. Neither did He faint, or humble himselfe, at the comming of Seleucus: but met him in the field, as ready to defend his owne; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinity with him, taking chiefly a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdoms, was continued by some Offices of loue betwene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased therupon, by the Indian king, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to haue some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receiue. Thus parted these two great kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any businesse worthy of remembrance with the Westerne Countreyes. The posteritie of Sandrocastus, is thought to haue retained that kingdom vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar: to whom Pompey, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, He said, That He had command ouer sixe hundred kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdom, in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophaganeus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiuing Presents; and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the higher side of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans, whose Greatnesse was the same indeed, that his was onely in seeming.

S. III.

The lowd reigne of Ptolemie Philopator in Egypt: with the tragical end of his sonne, where he was dead. Antiochus prepares to warre on the young child Ptolemie Epiphane, the son of Philopator. His irrefolution in preparing for diuers warres at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. Hee seeks to hold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending neuertheless to haue warre with him. His doings against the Hellespont, which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

THIS expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe a while; and studie which way to conuert the retrour of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolemie Philopator died: leauing his son Ptolemie Epiphane, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdom, vnlike by him to bee well defended, against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolemie furnished Philopator, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to haue had that surname given him in meere derision; as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. His young yeeres, being newly past, his childhood when he began to reigne, may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Father's death: yet the beastlinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischiefe, whereof hee could bee accused. Hauing woone the battaile at Raphiah, He gaue himselfe ouer to sensuality; and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had aduentured her selfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him vndertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant shipes off his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, & Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and Demetrius a filthy Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrey, till Philopator died: who hauing reigned seuentee yeeres, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphane, a child of five yeeres old, begotten on Aspasia that was his sister and wife. After the kings death, Agathoclea began to take vpon him; as Protector of young Epiphane, and Gouernour of the Land. He assembled the Macedonians (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemie the first, and

and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves; and bringing forth vnto them his sister Agathocles, with the yong King in her armes, began a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this yong King, had committed the childe into the armes of his sister, but vnto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the kingdome did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great neede was, defend their king against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to set the Diademe vpon his own head, being a meere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewith all he produced before them a witness, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting teares; yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake, but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the Assembly: He that had called it, being scarce aware how Agathocles therefore, whom the old kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wife nor well qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly been his manner, by vsing his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus, and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilst they were committed in the old kings name) to meete in knots together and vtter one to another their mindes, where in they had conceived extreame hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old king. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were some what also moued with feare of harme, which, in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernement, as afterwards he proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloved of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouision of victuals which wasto come into Alexandria. As these moriues wrought with the people: so by the remedy which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vprere. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom hee suspected of conspiracie against him, and deliuered him vnto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poore Souldier was carried into an incher roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormentted. But whilst the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Maeragenes the Souldier alone by himselfe, and the doores open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conueighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians, of whom he found some in a Temple therby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Ianizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus bene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to forge the Palace: crying out, That they would see the king, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse ado than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the old Bayd Ocanus fled into a Temple: her sonne and Daughter stayed in the Court, vntill the king was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office, as friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the streets; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging; the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice, beating them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus, who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon yong Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to get what part he could of the chilles estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopater in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and crayed helpe against these two kings, who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entered into cōuynant to diuide betweene them all all that belonged vnto this Orphan, whose Father had bene Confederate with them both. So M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the king of Egypt, especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; He was very soone found backed, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Aitolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not finde: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that he was sent thither onely one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath bene shewed before. As for Scopas: He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie; where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, he subdued the Iewes; who seeme to haue yeilded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they law him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cy-nosephale; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recovered all that had bin lost. Among the rest, the Iewes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbear to inuade; and gaue it out, that hee meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either, hoping, as may seeme, that the Countie would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarry; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Western parts of Asia, whilst Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appears that hee was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to afford him great aduantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath bene declared, seemed easily to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore he tooke what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Iewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, he was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadors, and desisted from that enterprise. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amity betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be overpassed, That these his Embassadors were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of king Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly bee troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Towns elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee sends in Armie Westward, intending to make what profit hee can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their kingdomes, hee offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendshippes, at one and the same time, when hee sought to make each of them a spoyle. Thus was hee acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies, which is a disease of great, and ouer-swelling fortunes. Howsoeuer it was, Hee sent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: willing them there to stay for him; whilst he himselfe with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whilst the warre of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meet him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because he should not ioine with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embassadours; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadours which he thither sent. He shewed his desire, to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better prooffe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadours.

The Rhodians appeare to haue been a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed between his Embassadours and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; vnlesse the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolomie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well, for that they had euer bene greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolomies. They therefore, in this time of necessity, gaue what aide they could vnto all the subjects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did king Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, between Antiochus and the Romans. For when king Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: He excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Phileterus, his brethren, wondred at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war vpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstaining from this affinitie, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee must be partaker in his overthrow, so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mighty neighbour, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where he took such order as he thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampfacus to obedience; that had vsurped their liberty, and obstinately strove to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed vnto the Hellespont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed ouer into Europe side, and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lyfismachia: which the Thracians had gotten & destroyed, when Philip withdrew his garrison thence, to imploy it in the Roman war. The Aetolians objected as a crime vnto Philip, in the conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lyfismachia, by thrusting therinto a garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his garrison did not oppresse the town, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good & substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such, might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lyfismachia at his comming thither. For the town was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the king tooke order to haue it re-edified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Country thereabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants, and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequentie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: he tooke a iourney in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Army, leauing the other halfe to repair the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the conuenient situation, & former glory of Lyfismachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer & establish the dominion in those parts which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearely pay: and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of king Seleucus followed shortly, so shall a deadly wound of the kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Countie, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight vnto the King Antiochus. The Aetolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Acheans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Laedemon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

FOR the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprife of the Kings about Lyfismachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe against Antiochus, than Embassadours to speak for him, because the one of these kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadours, withdrew his Inuasion from the kingdome of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadours to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whilst as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptance: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients vnto the Romans; then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worse, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsaillors sent from Rome, requested (as hath bin shewed before) with a commination of war, this kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-professed amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsaillors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnmindfull of the businesse: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging, L. Cornelius was sent from Rome, of purpose to deale with the king about those controuersies, that were between him and Ptolomie. What other priuate instructions Cornelius had; we may coniecture by the manning of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, hauing bin sent by Titus, were at Lyfismachia, He hastened thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsaillors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesianus and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadours present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolomie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Heereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and hee done nothing? Further he warned the king, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally He demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iourney there was none probable, than a purpose to make warre vpon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondred why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia: wherewith hee prayed them to let him alone; euen as hee, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his coming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lyfimachia, & the recovery of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace & Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that countrie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lyfimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie betweene him and the other Kings, had beene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had beene seized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of businesse, from looking vnto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in feare of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lyfimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this citie vpon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieued with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free cities, or against the king of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to ioyne ere long with Ptolomie, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refuse it; would needs heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampfacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampfacus being called in, beganne a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the king before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bad them hold their peace, forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the warre by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, & thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtful how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boistrous Gallo-Greeks, pretend onely the goodnesse of their swords; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greeks an opinion of their iustice, forbear the occasion of making themselves great. The king on the other side was wearie of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolomie was dead. Hereof neither the king, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdom, and L. Cornelius, to preuent him therof, and set the Countie in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador, both to Antiochus and to Ptolomie: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, & prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the king forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Arme, and left him to ouersee the building of Lyfimachia: but all his Sea-forces hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence hee sent Embassadors to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of peace, after such sort as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolomie was aliue. This made him beare another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintred: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lyfimachia, (at leastwise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had beene sent vnto the Macedonian, gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the Peace which was ganted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire society with them, whereby they should be bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were sollicitied; and particularly the Aetolians, That

That constantly & faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the people of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the firoward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to haue well vnderstood the purpose. They complained; that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had beene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vpbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not only for their Victory ouer Philip, but euen for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriuing at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate, and to chafe out of their citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen them an ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the liues, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they vse this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the citie, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though he was superiour vnto them during that yeere: yet had it not been their manner to beare much regard vnto such an annuall Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must bee accountable to them, if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Quæstors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Quæstor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduerser Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Iudges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greatnesse. But hee had not to doe with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Pursuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into iudgement before a publike assembly of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vndutifull stubbornnesse of this Quæstor had beene; but how vn-sufferable the insolencie of all the Iudges at the present was: whose vnbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when hee perceived that all the Citizens were attentiu and fauourable; hee forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man bee continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had beene passed, before he passed ouer Iberus: it would not perhaps haue beene in the power of Hanno, to haue brought him vnto necessity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation laid vpon the whole Commonaltie, as wanting money in their publike Treasurie, wherewith to defray either that, or diuers other needfull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publike Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes whatsoeuer; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vse, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof hee made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasurie were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the value of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once; euen when they thought themselves to haue been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome : wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome : these Enemies to the Barchines might well crie out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alledge, than their owne inuentions : they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beast, which would neuer be tamed : That secret messages past betweene him, and King Antiochus : and that he was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmfulfull to Carthage ; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate : but addressing their letters craftily, euery one to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators ; they wrought so well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage ; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal : as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witness against him, the man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vsed their Victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio : they wished for some such aduantage against Hannibal ; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadors they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Serrilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius 10 Marcellus : whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming ; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controuersies, betweene the Carthaginians and Masaniissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall vpon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough : against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight : but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination ; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed 30 Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place : whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had hee a Ship furnished with all things needfull ; as hauing long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So hee bade Africke farewell ; lamenting the misfortune of his Country, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Cercina ; hee found there in the Hauen some Merchants shippes of Carthage. They saluted him respectiue : and the chiefe among them began to enquire, whither hee was bound. Hee said, Hee went Embassador to Tyre : and that he intended there in the Island to make a sacrifice ; whereto hee invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hote weather : and therefore hee would needes hold his Feast vpon the shore ; where, because there wanted couert, Hee made 40 them bring thither all their sailes and yards to be vsed in stead of Tents. They did so ; and feasted with him till it was late at night : at which time he left them there asleepe ; and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador : neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina ; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diuerly confuted. Some ghesed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had bene seene : and then the Roman Embassadors, hauing none other errand 50 thither, accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace ; wherby they onely discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate ; mistaking the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderstand, that He fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally : as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity betweene their Cities, thought themselves to haue interest. Thence went hee to Antioch ; and, hiding the King, departed, visited his son in Daphne : who friendly welcommed med him, and sent him vnto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly reioyced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal : so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie ; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discouerie of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrey. For it would not proue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout Souldiers of base Asiatiques ; as it had bin by his trayning and discipline, to make very seruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardie, though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of cowardly people : yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal ; now a desolate and banished man ; than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions where-in he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely help to ennoble the Roman Victory : or if it further serued to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to auoid the war, then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept : it was not probable, that hee had any meaning to take Armes ; vnlesse by mere violence he were thereto enforced. Onely the Aetolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innouation, and therefore practising with this Great King ; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them ; they had of late bene answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsaillours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and vnaduised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing ; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to 30 right themselves : otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame ; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of war with Antiochus ; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrey. For the Aetolians were wont to vpbraide the rest of the Greeks with the vain libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliuerers had laid heavier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare ; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian : likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, and tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip made no delay, in accomplishment of that which 40 was laid vpon him : all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrey at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus ; Hee made it his daily suit, That the Peace betweene him and Rome, such as it was, might bee confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuertheless, T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, hee retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus : by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embassadors, that had bene sent ouer to assist him ; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlesse fall vpon Greece : wherein he should find not onely the Aetolians, but Nabis the 50 Tyrant of Lacedaemon, ready to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies : especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance ; whilest Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intentiue to his business. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar ; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand ; P. Cornelius Scipio the African, desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal.

Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarrance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be sorry; though for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is already shewed, whilst he had warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achæans; neither since that time had he done any thing, whereby he should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, wheron to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the war with Philip, not only the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the noble City of Argos was left in subiection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duely to consider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to bee vndertaken; or whether otherwise to auoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselves. The Athenian Ambassador made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as hee could deuise. Hee gaue thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, such notable vertue & high deserts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imagination, to foretell what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would haue required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already receiued. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Ætoliens. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian rose vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their City had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty generall: from which honour they were now so farre fallne, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would leade all the rest into seruitude. Then spake He against the Achæans, Clients that had beene a long time vnto the Macedonian; and souldiers of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, He said, had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætoliens, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes beene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth, hauing beene alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could neuer be at libertie, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesse wherewith to finde themselves occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Ætoliens themselves did promise, & would vndertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece; that was now at vnitie. These words had beene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparant, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Ætoliens; as did their owne rauinous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselves, that worse would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had beene covenanted, That the Romans should enioy the spoyle of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Ætoliens. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole assembly, especially the Achæans, erie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Ætolian theëues bee enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discourtenancing the Ætoliens, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsaillours which had beene sent vnto him from Rome, to bee his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian warre; it was very soone ended. For Titus vsed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if hee should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Enmenes with a Nauie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the seruice: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether it were to get fauor of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Ætoliens: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing removed the Ætoliens from that degree of fauour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedæmonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argiues, more bold than wise, began a conspiracie against the Lacedæmonians that held their Towne, meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neere, they were all detected and slaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were quiet. But there was no stir within the Walls: the execution done vpon the first mouers, hauing terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedæmon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the Warre was made, pittie it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most heauily.

Nabis had in readinesse an Army of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countreie; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumitted slaues, malefactors and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyranny was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an assembly: and compassing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, hee said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest before-hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preferue not only the City and his owne person from danger, but them also for the punishment, which else they might haue incurred. Hereupon hee cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom hee leades away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was hee sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noysed abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby vnderstand, that it was a mortal crime to bee suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe vnto some some poore wretches : whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and slaine. Having thus affrighted the Citizens : He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a fallie : wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at first ; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta : but ouer-ranne the Countrey ; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time, with king Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid siege vnto Gyttheum, the onely or principall Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force ; when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouvernours within the Towne equall in authoritie : whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other fin-ling what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor ; after whose death, he himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gyttheum : this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place ; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne in law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment, with a thousand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thousand Argiues : it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gyttheum : which he thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke vpon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Titus : requesting onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe : prouing, that he suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments ; whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could object vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon hee inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleged, they ought to make warre vpon him ; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from 30 entering into that League with him, which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to bee on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with Tyrannie ; and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him ; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alleged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans : That he had bargained to ioyne with Philip ; when he was their enemy, not onely in League, but also in affinity : and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Pyracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom hee had long held warre : it may seeme to haue bene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Messene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip : they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant ; and therefore not to haue bene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristianus, the Prætor of the Achæans, very well perceived : who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their own iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong ; framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his owne estate ; & to settle his fortunes, whilest he might do it without hazzard : alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages ; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happinesse, as priuate men. Thus they discoursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos ; and requested them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the City of Sparta : they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending, Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. He would not suffer the Lacedæmonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete ; no, nor to make any Confederacies ; nor warre, either in that Island or else where ; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands ; not to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barkes ; besides many other troublesome iniunctions ; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be paid out of hand, and fiftie talents yeerely, for eight 10 yeeres next ensuing. For obseruance of these Couenants hee demanded fise hostages, such as he himselfe should name ; and one of them to bee the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had bene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon iustice : then had it bene enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him ; which he himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie : then should this enterprife, when once it was taken in hand, haue bin prosecuted vnto the very vtmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held : as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themselves by the spoyle 20 of one that had not offended them ; nor pleasing to the Achæans, who iudged it euer after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus : so did it minister vnto the Ætolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subiect of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Towns in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors : it was thought very strange, that Lacedæmon ; once the most famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yesterday : and hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe vnmercifully dealt withall, by the selfe-same 30 Romans, whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinitie of the Macedonian king, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But fallily had he dealt with the Macedonian : and fallily was hee dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him ; saue onely that for the banished Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe ; hauing among them Agisipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a young childe was driuen out by Lycurgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no prouision, to haue them restored vnto their Citie and Estates ; but onely leaue required for as many of their wiues, as would be so contented, to liue abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to giue consent vnto these demands : 40 and sustained an assault or two ; hoping belike that the enemies would soone bee wearie. But his fearfull nature shortly ouercame the resolution, which the sense of these iniuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had bene propounded, hee deliuered the hostages ; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans faire more wicked than himselfe ; and was ready vpon the first aduantage, to doe them all the mischief that he could.

The Argiues had heard news that Lacedæmon was euen at point of being taken. This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to set vpon the Garrison ; which was much weakened, by the remooue of the three 50 thousand carried thence by Pythagoras to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should set their hands to the getting of it ; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was ioyfully welcomed. Hee was deferuedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had layed hold without staying for him : and that he might the better entitle himselfe thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argiues to be proclaimed at the Nemean games ; as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councell of Achæia ; whereby the Achæans were not more strengthened, than the Argiues themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little businessse or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed vnto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vnynckere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Aetolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making War. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Aetolians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrey, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; hee called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There hee recounted vnto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly he gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achaens; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, & promising to do the like (which very soone he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be knowne, what lyers the Aetolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With ioyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransom and enlarge all Romans, that had bene sold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Countrey before his departure was vrged, left therein behinde him the memory of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by ieaousie & suspition of any euill meaning. At his comming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoyle of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasle or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Masse vnwrought, some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Siluer; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureteen Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice, the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Pentrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this Triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answers, excepting those of king Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counsaillors; because their businessse was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said vnto Titus & his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betwene the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that hauing warred together, were vpon equall termes of aduantage; or betwene those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the imposition of some Conenants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had bene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsuall to demand, and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But betwene those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neither carry it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kinde, was the league & friendship that had bene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia hee should set at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, that since they went so distinctly to worke, Hee would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choyce whether to accept: Eyther that it should be lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would haue them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoeuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampascus, or any other Asiaticques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make warre with a King that sought their loue, and had neuer done them iniury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lyfimachia, whereon of late he had bene at so much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundation, and reoppling it with Inhabitants, that had all bene dispersed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alledged: saying, That Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to set at liberty those Towns, which the King would oppresse and hold in subiection: especially since those Townes were of Greekish blood and language, and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had afforded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon haue left Antiochus king of not many subiects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neither did they forbear to say, That, vnlesse hee would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might bee vnderstood) with such as were his subiects. Wherefore they vrged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make; little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Villius, and others that had bin already with the King at Lyfimachia; by whom they might receiue a finall answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him liue in peace.

§. V.

Of the long warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Masaniissa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for iustice in vaine.

THE Insubrians, Bojians, & other of the Cisalpine Gaules, together with the Ligurians, made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italy, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselves were vtterly subdued: which was nor, before the Romans were almost at the very height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amikar a Carthaginian, to bee Leader vnto them all, as hath bene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armies, grew to bee such willing partakers each of others fortune; that seldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stir alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lumbardie; it hath bin long since rehearsed between the first and second Punicke Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrey, by means of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would haue beene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre, had not beene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a stout nation, light and swift of bodie; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Countrey was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor besieged. They were also very poore; and had little or nothing that might giue contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiers to hardnesse & military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaules, 10 their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing & spoiling the Territories of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, seemes to haue bin grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vsing their aduantage, or taking reuenge of iniuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betwene them and any of their neighbours, doe vse commonly this answer, It hath still bene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Diners ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they receiued. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrey was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their owne Countrey they did little harme: not sending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make warre, saue on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Prouinces, which was wholly & thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Ox- 40 hide: & the Romans found in it the property of that Ox-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardie Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being diuided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer provided in generall for the common good of their Countrey; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto 50 their owne Territory. Such priuate respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had vnited themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had bene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Cholericke Spanish humour; by employing as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vnquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and vsed them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which which they raised vpon the whole Countrey; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwise the Romans, vsing the seruice of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much businesse with them. Spaine was too far distant, and withal too great, for them to send ouer Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armies in the Countrey, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captaines, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrey; though seldome in peace.

Very soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans; en vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Countrey, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subiection, brought peace vpon the Countrey; which lasted five yeeres. This victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the Warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the Warre; which after five yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconsull, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to send thither two Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. Those did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consull the yeere following, and sent into that Prouince; found at his coming little lesse to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the paines that other tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great victory vpon the chieftest of 30 them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him vnto much new trouble. Whilest he was about to make a journey against those that were as yet vnsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were euen ready to rebell. Hee therefore disarmed them: which they tooke so heauily, that many of them slew themselves, for very griefe. Hearing of this; and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietnesse, which they neuer had disturbed but vnto their owne great losse, He prayed them to deuise what course might be taken, for holding them assured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counsaile in a matter of this nature. Hauing therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding 40 their inuention barren in this kinde of Subiect; Hee gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the walls of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrimen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, with a iest, That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, hee could pay them with the Enemies money. Finally, He brought the warre to so good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by causing some Mines of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. 50 Herein hee did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of war, which might well be thentermed the Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vsfull qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skilfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, & not vnprofitable in any businesse either priuate or publike. Many bookes he wrote: wherof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his Houſe. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: ſo as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which moſt commended him vnto the better ſort of the Romans, was his great ſinceritie of life, abſtinance from bribes, and faſhioning himſelfe to the ancient laudable Cuſtomes of the Citie. Herein he had merited ſingular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not cauſed him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and ſome other worthy men; that were no leſſe honeſt than himſelfe, though farre leſſe ſiged, and more gallant in behauiour. Otherwiſe, hee was a very good Citizen, and one of ſuch temper, that he could faſhion himſelfe to all occaſions; as if he were neuer out of his Element. He loued buſineſſe ſo well, or rather hated vice ſo earneſtly; that euen vnto the end of his life, he was exerciſed in defending himſelfe, or accuſing others. For at the age of foureſcore & fixe yeers, He pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeeres after, he accuſed Sergius Galba vnto the People. So began the Nobility of Cato his familie; which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the Vtican: one, that being of like vertue and ſeruenice, had all his good purpoſes daſht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of ſuch Nobilitie and Greatneſſe as this his Anceſtor had continually vexed.

The Spaniſh warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrey ſeldome free from inſurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two euery yeere 20 were ſent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was diuided into Governments) did rarely faile of ſuch worke, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One ſlew thirtene thouſand Spaniards in a battell: another tooke ſixtie Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to ſue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or moſt of them, did ſome laudable ſeruiſe; and yet ſo, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in ſtead of the old that were ſlaue, taken, or reclaimed. At the cauſes hereof, I haue already pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to ſay, That the buſineſſe in Spaine required not the employment of a Roman Conſul, from ſuch time as Cato thence departed, vntill the Numantian Warre broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countreies to the Weſt of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but ſo had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine Houſe promiſed all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themſelves & their obedient Citie: Mafaniſſa fell to diſputing with the ſword, about the title to the beſt part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the leſſer Syrtis; wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrey the Numidian challenged; & by winning ſome part of it, ſeemed to better his claime vnto the whole. Hee had a great aduantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any warre, without leaue obtained from their Maſters the Romans. They had none other way of redreſſe, than by ſending to Rome 40 their Complaint of his doings. And ſurely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Iudges had bene vnpartiall. For beſides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the poſſeſſion of this Countrey: Mafaniſſa himſelfe, now very lately purſuing a Rebelle that fled out of his Kingdome, deſired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himſelfe to paſſe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwiſe bene questionable) that the Countrey was theirs. This notwithstanding, Mafaniſſa had where-with to iuſtifie his proceedings, eſpecially vnto the Roman Senate. He gaue the Fathers to vnderſtand by his Embaſſadours, what faithleſſe people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been ſent vnto them from Hannibal, one that ſhould perſwade them to take part with Antiochus. 50 This man they had examined vpon ſome ſuſpicion of his errand; yet neither arreſting him nor his ſhip, had thereby afforded him meanes to eſcape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpoſe to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Countrey of Emporia: it had alwayes, he ſaid, bene theirs that were able to hold it by ſtrong hand: and ſo belonged ſometime vnto the Numidian kings; though now of late it was in poſſeſſion of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than 4 that that whereon their Citie ſtood; or ſcarcely to ſo much. For they were no better than ſtrangers in Africk, that had gotten leaue there to build vpon ſo much ground, as they could encompaſſe with an Ox-hide cut into ſmall thongs. Whatſoeuer they held without ſuch a compaſſe, was purchaſed by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This conſidered, Mafaniſſa requested of the Senate, That they would not adiudge vnto ſuch ſurpers, the Countrey ſometimes appertaining to the Anceſtors of him their aſſured friend. The Romans hauing heard theſe allegations on both ſides, found the matter ſo doubtful, that they could not on the ſudden tell what to determine. Wherefore becauſe they would doe nothing raſhly; they ſent ouer three Embaſſadours, of whom P. Scipio the 10 African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuerſie: yet ſecretly giuing them inſtructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaſſadours followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Mafaniſſa with a ſtrong Armie ſhould quickly preuaile, againſt thoſe that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime againſt the wrong. By ſuch Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from ſtirring in fauour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any diſpoſition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall deſtruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leiſure to expreſſe the vtmoſt of their hatred.

§. VI.

10 The Ætolians labour to prouoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to warre vpon the Romans by whom they hold themſelves wronged and diſgraced. Nabis beſiegeth Gythium, and waſteth ſome part of Achaia. The exact ſkill of Philopœmen, in aduantage of Pyrrhus: whereby hee utterly vanquiſheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans, ioyne with the Ætolians. The Ætolians ſurprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis, their Confederates, ſeize vpon Sparta. But they are driuen out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his perſwaſions annexe themſelves to the Achaians.

30 AL L Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed; it grieved much the Ætolians to thinke, that they who had promiſed vnto themſelves the whole ſpoyle of Philip, and the higheſt reputation among the Greeks; were not onely diſappointed of their couetous hopes, but quite forſaken by their ancient dependants, and of all other the moſt vnregarded. Yet was there made a great acceſſe to their Eſtate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had bene taken from the Macedonian. This might well haue ſufficed them, if their deſires had not bene immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their deſire. But they were, not ſo pleaſed with that which they had, ſince they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themſelves to be wholly diſeſteemed, wherein they thought that they had vnſuf- 40 ſerable wrong. Wherefore they deuised, in a Parliament which they ſhortly held, by what meanes they beſt might right themſelves, and giue the Romans a ſorrowful knowledge of the difference, betwene their enmity and friendſhip. To this purpoſe they ſoone agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perſwade Antiochus to make war vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long reſuſed Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to ioyne altogether in a new Confederacy: whoſe ioynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far ſurmount thoſe of the Romans, Achaians, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enter- 50 priſe, which the Ætolians tooke in hand; and well beſeeming them, for they were great 30 dars. They ſent Embaſſadours to all theſe Kings, with perſwaſions, as they thought moſt forcible. But Philip was irrefolute; and Antiochus willing to try firſt all other courſes. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had loſt much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet ſhewed himſelfe of all other the moſt forward: and not ſtaying ſo much as to ſeek any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay ſiege vnto Gythium; that had bene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achaians, to whoſe care chiefly Titus at his departure had committed the affaires of Peloponneſus, were not ſlow to admoniſh Nabis of his duty: neither would they haue ſtaied long from repreſſing his violence by open VVare; had not ſome of them thought it wiſedome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent time in sending Embassadors, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the coming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iust cause of complaint, by waiking their owne Territorie.

Philopamen was then Prator of the Achæans, who had long bin absent in Crete; making war there for his mindes sake & recreation. Vnto him the Achæans referred themselves, giuing him leaue to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haste to relieue Gytthem by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Achæan Garrison within it, should be lost, if to he vsed any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. Hee made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeeres agoe bene counted a gallant vessell, in the Nauie of Antigonius Gomatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with their wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleete saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saued themselves with what speed they could. But Philopamen was not herewith danted. If hee had failed in Sea-seruice, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gytthem, to stop the Achæans if they should inuade the Countrie. But vpon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came vnexpected; fired their Camp, and put all, saue a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched hee with all his Army towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gytthem. It was not expected that Nabis would haue bene ready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gytthem, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must ouertake them, and charge them in the Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some fife miles; hauing their Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when he walked or travelled abroad with his friends, to marke the situation of the Countrie about him; and to discouise, what might befall an Armie marching the same. He would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were vpon that ground encountred by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were meet for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand: what peece of ground it were meet for him to seize vpon; and in what manner he might best doe it: in what fort he should order his men; where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Guard; in what fort encampe himselfe; and which way march the day following. By such continuall meditation, Hee was growne so perfect, that hee did neuer meet with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, Hee encamped neere vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Achæans lay the neerer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place conuenient; wherein to the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, hee caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant; as a fugitiue, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purposeto get between him and Lacedæmon; wherby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recouerie of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue bene forced.

Some

Some Companies he made to stay behinde, and shew themselves vpon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopamen was not so to be beguiled. Hee easily wonne the Campe, and gaue chase to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopamen conceiued a right, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselves, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when hee had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilest it was day, He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, & occupied the two most ordinary passages vnto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopamen Campe great store of lights; thought that all had bene at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty dayes together after this, did Philopamen waite the Countrey round about, whilest Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leauing the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, & T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus & Nabis, whom they knew to bee solicited by the Ætolians. Very faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receiue other fauours at their hands; and regain possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilest their Embassadors that were with him in Asia, denyed otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Ptolome and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the kings sonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadors, caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answer as at their setting forth.

One thing that might haue bene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Liue rather thinkes) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspicion wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Capitaines that had liued, Hannibal iudged the most worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrhus the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldest thou haue said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the first place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceiued this change in the King: and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recouered his former grace, and credit. For hee told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he neuer should be friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the king not to regard any vaine surmises: but to know thus much, That so long as he thought vpon warre with Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good seruice: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behooue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Ætolians, and their friends, were no lesse busie all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering vp their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vnting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victory against Philip; that finally they preuailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, vntles he would buy it at a deare rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vaine. He vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own forces to the vttermost : as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselves, without helpe from any ; saue onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the king Antiochus that animated them to resolution : the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little, by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approue the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the businesse worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small 10 piece of seruice, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduventure. Wherefore he came to their Panatholium, or great Assembly of the Nation ; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprize which they took in hand, whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Country, the Romans, and king Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Ma-
 * the Sticklers. As for those grieuances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doeto send Embassadors to Rome, that should either pleade 20 their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired : than thus to set the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the king, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired, either as their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such termes had they been feasted once already: and whereby the Senate reiected vnto Titus : who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction ; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Where 30 fore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as wel to set the country at libertie, as also to decide the controuerfies depending between the Romans and Ætoliens. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the kings minde before. Hauing made it, they forgot no point of brauery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe : but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if hee came to their campe in Italy vpon the riuer of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better, as the Ætoliens are like to vnderstand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant hence- 40 forth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more priuate Councell of their Nation, that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta : to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden, entring, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citty : who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had bene drinen to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loued him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions, that were 50 not many, seized vpon a Gate, whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely, to deliuer the Towne from the Romans ; who more insolently dominated ouer it, than cuer the Macædonians had done. By which Rhetoricke they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force.

force. For the Towne-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this businesse was dashed. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne, styling himselfe King : but, more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had well-nere lost all, by means of the ouerthrow which Philopamen had lately giuen him: since, he durst not stirre abroad ; and daily expected the mischiefe, that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore hee sent messengers, one after another, to the Ætoliens ; requesting them, That as He had not bene slow to stirre in their behalfe, but adu ventured himselfe 10 vpon the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward ; so they would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to neede it. It hath bene often said, That the rauenous Ætoliens were onely true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenarie forces, which vpheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed : they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way ; &c. by so doing, to assure Lacedæmon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Democritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the 20 Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make warre with the Achæans, or to doe ought else, saue onely what Alexamenus should command them ; which were it neuer so desperate, and in seeming against all reason ; yet must they vnderstand, that vnlesse they performed it, they should haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words : telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip : since the Elephants of this great king, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the Ætoliens, He said, that if need should so require, they would 30 presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raise : But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could before the great king, which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart, bring forth his men, that had bin long pent vp in the Citty, and traine them without the wals : as if shortly he should employ them in worke of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this : and daily exercised his men in the field ; riding vp and downe with this Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his Ætoliens, and say somewhat as he thought fit : which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he 40 saw time for the great worke that he had in hand : He then went aside to his thirtie horsemen, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their setting forth ; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vnlesse they would anone come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them : and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and stricke him downe. The thirtie Ætoliens neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter : but all flew in ; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ranne vnto the dead body : where in stead of seeking reuenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætoliens hastened into the Citty, and seized on the Palace : where he fell to ransacking the Treasure ; and troubled 50 himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like ; with the greater indignation of the Citizens, who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not indure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the towne was shortly in Armes : and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had bene brought vp with Nabis his children ; whom they mounted vpon a good Horse, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell vpon the Ætoliens that were idley stragling about ; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with with not many of his Company, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates, who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopamen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citi, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexamennus should haue done after he had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safety, to incorporate themselues with the Achæans. Thus by the enterprife, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Aetolians, and the small, but effectuall, trauaile of Philopamen, the Achæans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin gouerned either by kings, or by Tyrants that called themselues kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, wherof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

§. VII.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Aetolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages betwene him, the Aetolians, Chalcidians and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubœa. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Aetolians, with the Ciuill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betwene the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanitie, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; where hee marieth a young wife, and reuels away the rest of winter. Vpon the coming of the Roman Consul all forsaie Antiochus. He with two thousand Aetolians keeps the Streights of Thermopyla. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece vnto the Victors.

Antiochus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behinde him; and to winnethem by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speede conuenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was already vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Aetolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were ready to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africke, there to molest the Romans, & so giue him the better leisure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Aetolian came ouer to him, & bad him lay all other care aside, for that his Country-men had already taken Demetrias; a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceede as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the king, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without neede of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprife there could not be chosen a more vsit man to be employed in the kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the king should as greatly feeble the losse of a Fleet at Arme, perishing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal prospered, Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should be alwayes nere vnto the kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkened vnto this admonition; being ielous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And therupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a sumptuous pompe of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Ilium, there to doe sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Aegean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Enrylochus the Magnetian, the same whom the Aetolians had lately waited on home; when by that pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chiefe man & Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countrymen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of ioy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Arme somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which, no more than fortie were seruicable for the Warres; with an Arme of ten thousand Foot, sixe hundred Horse, and sixe Elephants. The Aetolians no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament; & made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe, and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Aetolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Arme. This was, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready, but hasted vnto their aide, euen whilest the season was vsit for navigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armes, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which he had vndertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leaving the Countrie free indeede, and the Aetolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armes that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because hee would not be any way burdensome vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprovided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he stood in neede. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betwene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeelde vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a businesse of dangerous importance; vpon the promised assurance of a State that is meere popular. For if the veltimencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell: the Aetolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceiued them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must haue bene contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first vndertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure neede to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behinde him at Demetrias. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Aetolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsfull; they said, would neuer be obtained, vntill by remoouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euery seuerall Estate had where to finde redresse of any preece. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheless desired them onely, so to ioyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans and Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginarie, but absolute, for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute, was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lanes, and without being tied vnto conditions which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But since hee, and the Ætolians, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Ætolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeelde: before all the succours could arriue, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten, all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antiochus. Foure or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer-late to haue defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little town of Boeotia, lying ouer against the Iland; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priuiledge of an inuiolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilest others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himselfe in many vaine Treaties of peace, tooke aduantage of their carelesnesse, and vsed them with all extremitie of warre. Very few of them escaped: fiftie were taken; and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintius was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more iust cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked wel these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece, in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wiser sort returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referred themselves vntill he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He must hold them excused for not coming to stirre; or, if he came, the Romans must pardon their iust feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, ioynd with him in true meaning; save the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achæans. Little reason there was, that he should thinke to draw the Achæans to his partie. Neuertheless he assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was said to beare vnto Philopemens vertue, had bred a secret dislike betwene that Nation & the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Ætolians sent Embassadors to the Councell at Ægium; that spared not braue words, if the Achæans would haue beene so taken. The Kings Embassador told of great Armies & Fleets that were coming; reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimæans & Caducians; names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Arabians, and Pamphilians were; such indeede as could not be resisted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the vntmost parts of the East, requested no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilest He tooke order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætolian Embassador, & further added, that in the battell at Cynosephale, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both He & his Armie had beene there destroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could haue beene desired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Embassador, nor the Ætolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus lincked the King and the Ætolians together. For euen such bragges as here they made, before the Achæans, who knew them to be lyars, had the Ætolians also made vnto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory ouer Philip to be meereley their Act: and the whole Country of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadors told euen now, of Dahans, and Arabians, & Elimæans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaves, and good for little else. These diuers names of rascall people, he said, like to the diuersitie of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no such vanter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, wherewith he wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him; than so many peeces of one tame swine, drest after severall fashions with varietie of sauces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make iudgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Armie hee was faine in a manner, to begge victuals of the Ætolians; and take vp money at vsurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne vp and downe the Country; from Demetrias to Lamia, thence backe to Chalcis, and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lyes: wherewith since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men tooke heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditory much perswasion is needlesse. The Achæans did not loue so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abjects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how hee sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed warre against him, and against the Ætolians.

How the hatred betwene these two Nations grew, inueterate; sufficiently appears in the story foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwisely: though farre the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countie at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue beene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue fought, not how Smyrna and Lampascus might recouer their liberty (which had neuer been held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countie, as two Seas by an Isthmus or neck of land, might bee kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiaticques, which originally were Greekish; than the general applause, wherewith all the nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countie, had beene farre from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely & generously declared themselves altogether from the Romans, their friends & benefactors. All the rest haue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firm against Antiochus, yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Boeotians willingly receiued him, as soone as he entred vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had bin somewhat hardly vsed. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man; and vaunted himselfe to be descended from Alexander the Great; hauing his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander: Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Albania: where hauing made his folly knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; Hee was iudged by Antiochus and the Actolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him believe, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather, it was their purpose to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his belouer: since no man had thereto good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behooued him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginary king (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get lone of the Macedonians that should be his subjects; or whether from some vanity in king Antiochus that employed him, without more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good.) There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynosephalæ, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but king Philip took it in high indignation; as intended meere vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein they should be pleased to vse him.

The Actolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Boeotians, & Athamapians, hauing now all ioyned with him, Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring; because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another; confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long bene cast aside, as a vessel of no vse; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. Hee freely told the king, That what he should now vtter, was euen the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Boeotians, & other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts; what were they else than so many poore Estates; that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same feare for their excuse. Wherefore he thought most behoouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioine with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though indeede what neede was there, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope. For, said Hee, These Actolians here present; and namely, this Thoas, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motiues which he then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that Philip was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that king to some wilde beast, that was chained or locked up within some grate, and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomacke, upon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if is prone otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behooue vs to looke vnto him; that he may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage; let Seleucus be in readinesse, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him workt to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprize, wherein now you are embarked against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: whereto had you then giuen care, the Romans by this time should haue heard other news, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours; Italie and Gaul should haue been on fire with war; and little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italy. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Armie hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouthes.) Wherefore let the one halfe be employed against Italy; whilst you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen ready to follow vs into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduise; who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of war; yet how to war with the Romans, I haue been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile soeuer you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; saue onely that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessaly, about which they had before disputed. There when they had wonne one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprietor, did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemy vnto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines toppes afarre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had bene comming vpon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeere; He brake vp his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a young Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiers as readily imitated their Captaines: in such wise that when he tooke the field, he might evidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this loosenesse of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise Hee was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of far lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had bin long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and superstition, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Boijans; wherein hee purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, & fifteen Elephants. Ptolemie King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with king Antiochus; and Philip king of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and siluer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young, and dwelt too farr off. So his money was returned vnto him with thanks; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philip's Embassadours answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that Hee should giue to Acilius the Consul. Masaniissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should bee most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine, which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And here in Masaniissa farre out-went the poore city of Carthage; as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vnderooke to set out a Fleet at their own charges; and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-money, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yearly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne, it was accepted, with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hastie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, between the Roman and the Asiaticke souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same maner as he had preuailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe forsake him. But King Philip and Bebius, hauing recouered many places; and the Roman Consul being arriued, against whom none made resistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good seruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking stocke, & sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians vsed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yelding to the King. All their cities, one after other, gaue vp themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplexe Antiochus; who hauing withdrawne himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, Hee found all the promises of the Ætoliens meere verball: and himselfe reduced into tearmes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea a very Prophet, that had fore-seene all this long before. Neuerthelesse He sent word to the Ætoliens, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their own need to be no lesse than his. But the Ætoliens had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus, who hauing promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioined with him. Hereat the king was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thon and his fellowes had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take Armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: Hee seized vpon the Streights of Thermopylae; as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopylae there hath been spoken enough * before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceiued, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came towards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Iedge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece; vnlesse they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betwene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three daies together, against a World of men coming to invade the Country. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himself vnto the safetie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whilst he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Ætoliens, intreating them not to forsake him thus; but at leastwise now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come downe vpon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that vnderooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the the Streights, without staying to expect king Philip: that was hindered by sicknesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them bene Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try, whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Ætoliens. He himselfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what base conditioned enemies they had to deale, but what rich kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a foreboding, for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, saue onely that he failed in his intent; and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepe Rocks and crooked wayes: He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst Hee, being a very able man of body, took in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeede it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylae bin so often the Seat of War, as might cause any traualers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which he discovered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Ætoliens very neere vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lustie Cruc of his men, whom he thought fittest for that seruice; and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and hee thereby vnderstood, that these Ætoliens were no more than fixe hundred; as also that king Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So hee presently set vpon the Ætoliens, ouerthrew them, slew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by flying into their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was already begun betwene the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the kings men, and driuen them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Streights; was notably fortified, and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill-side, and powred down a shoure of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Ætoliens had bene coming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman Armes and ensignes were discovered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this dayes losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had imbraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and intreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recouered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætoliens onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis he met with king Philip, that hauing recouered health, came to ioyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victory was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who saine would haue gotten Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to be taken, when the Consul, hauing won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoyle of these townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylae. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was ready to ease him of his charge.

The

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto king Antiochus presently after his flight, entreating him not to forsake them vicerly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece, or if any thing withheld him from comming in person, at leastwise to help them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour, but appertained vnto his owne safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backs, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicaner, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Then, another of their Embassadors, hee retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might vrge the king to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them, then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suite vnto the Consul to obaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said He had other businesse in hand; onely he granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata, willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alledge how well they had deserued of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith; signified, in their vse of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yeelding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said hee, I command you first of all, That none of you presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse priuate or publike: then, That ye deliuer vp vnto me Dicaarchus the Ætolian, Menelestratus the Epiror, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countreimen as haue followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custome of the Greekes, who had yeelded themselves vnto his faith; not vnto slavery. What? (said the Consul) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euery one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apoletii or ordinarie Council of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions, without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause he entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This surceance of warre, during ten and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had bene commanded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that king, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Armie, like one that could not be trusted in imployment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further neede of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Ætolians; taking for his reward, all that hee could get. And he got in that space all Athamania, Perrhaebia, Aperantia, & Dolopia. For the Ætolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill-provided for Warre, yet they could not indure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened,

et Polyb. 13.

that Nicaner about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with money and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea, & Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His money Nicaner conueighed into Lamia, by very vnusuall dexterity. But he himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, thereto make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his iourney, which lay betwene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the aduenture, and keeping as farre as he could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but either to be deliuered vnto the Romans, or vsed ill enough by Philip. But it seemed, that the king had not hitherto conceived well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For He commanded his seruants to entreat Nicaner friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he lost vnto giuing him to understand, That the Ætolians did now reape the fruits of their owne madness; forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselves contented; but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well in their acquaintance first with the Romans; & then with king Antiochus; but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship; whereof hitherto they had neuer made any small: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would be much more appaileable vnto each of them, than their small catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the king willed Nicaner to signify vnto his Communitie; and privately to hold in minde the courteise which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata. He louingly dismissed him. For this beneuolence Nicaner was alwaies after dutifully affected to the Crown of Macedonia: as in the warre of Perseus he made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission in such wise as he required it: hee forthwith meane to prosecute the warre against them; without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither hee therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconieued it: for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Antiochus stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should haue bene a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So He said there wellere all the following time of his Consulship, whilest the Macedonian king and the Achæans made farre better vse of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had reuolted vnto Antiochus; and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hostie course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achæans called to accompt the Eleians and Messenians: which had long bene addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleians gaue good words; whereby they saued themselves from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other helpe when the Achæan Prætor wasted their Countrey; than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Achæans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achæan Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annexe themselves vnto the Achæans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Maiestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Achæans; yet could not like it wel, that either they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euen termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus; which had once been Philip; and was afterward giuen by him to Aminander, who sent a Gouvernor thither. But when Aminander in this present warre, was driuen out of his owne Kingdome by Philip; then did the Gouverneur of Zacynthus offer to sell the Ile to the Achæans; whom he found ready Chapmen. Titus liked not of this; but plainly told them, That the Romans would betheir owne Masters, add take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their their Enemies as a reward of the victory which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Achaens referred themselves vnto his discretion. So hee told them, that their Commonwealth was like a Toxoyie, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell; and that holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes; which might greatly hurt them. Having settled things thus in Peloponnesus, hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glaborio the Consul had laine two moneths; that might haue bene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which hee had vpon the Aetolians; or out of dislike of king Philip thirving so fast, he perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, & to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves, craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Aetolians haue made such earnest suit as they did vnto Timo, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glaborio had bene sure to carry it in any short space; it may well be thought hee would not haue gone away without iussure the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole flower of the Nation, would haue made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came vnto Rome, no treaty could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should giue approbation. They had not so much mony: neither could they well hope to bee gently dealt withall, if they should giue themselves away vnto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnderstood. Wherefore they desired to haue it set downe in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeeld vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilest the Aetolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consull had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to set things in order among the troublesome Achaens. Hee would haue had them to restore the banished Lacedemonians home into their Countrey; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Commonwealth. This the Achaens liked well enough; but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedemonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meere grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Achaens: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted, and saw that they should haue their desire, without such compulsiue mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Linius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the king Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and fise and twenty saile of Rhodians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chase. The kings Fleet was the better of faile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betooke himselfe to a speedy retreat.

And such end had the first yeeres warre, betweene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vaine hopes of the Aetolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare; thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now send to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his younger sonne, whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolomit of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard hee desired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, wherein soeuer it pleased them to vse it, should not bee wanting. This Ptolomit was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of Fortune. He vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The same did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himselfe a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had bin in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, & make him try the chance of a battell for his kingdome.

S. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. Hee grants long Truce to the Aetolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia: Much trouble some businesse by Sea; and diuers fights. An inuasion vpon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamus, rayed by an handfull of the Achaens. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battaile of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victorie. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiaticke, as his brother was stiled The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with G. Lelins. Lelins was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would bee so pleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazzard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approued well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied vpon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had bene victorious against that same Great Worthy? But indeed a worser man might haue serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation; where his wisdom was much approued, but his liberty and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a signe of the freedome that he vsed in his censures, euen whilest hee liued in such a Court. Antiochus mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him wish, that he had bene serued by such braue men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Siluer, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the king, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the world: meaning, that all his Cost vpon the backes of cowardly Asiatickes, was no better than a spoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King, it is easie to ghesse. The little vse that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the vse of his seruice, when he stood in greatest necessitie thereof.

The Scipios made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the war, about fise thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquerene Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Amilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glaborio besieging Amphyssa a City of the Aetolians. The Aetolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vnraged the last yeere. Glaborio knowing this, deceiued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphyssa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foote, and fise hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphyssa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Aetolians:

lians : entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words : and willed them to perswade the Aetolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro : though Pullius continued to put them in good hope ; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had been charged from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre : whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate ; or any helpfull commoditie which time should afford. So they obtained halfe a yeeres truce : after which, the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeeres leisure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio : who thought to all time lost, which with-held the Warre from passing ouer into Asia.

The businesse of Aetolia being thus laid aside : and the old Consul Glabrio sent home into Italy : the Scipio marched into Thessaly ; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon & Thrace vnto the Hellespont. Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyalty of King Philip : who might either do them some mischief by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable aduantage : or at the least, would be vnfaithfull ; though he were not so courageous, yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victuals, if by no greater inconuenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. Hee had promised them the utmost of his furtherance : wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall, by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as he should take them on the sudden. The King was merry at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came : whom he louingly bade welcome ; and shewed him the next day, not only what prouision of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges ouer the riuers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracchus returned backe in haste vnto the Scipio's : who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readinesse, that might helpe to aduance their iourney. The King entertained them royally ; and brought them on their way, euen to the Hellespont : where they stayed a good while, vntill their Nauie was in readinesse to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere ; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian : true to the King ; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countrymen that had expelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans & Eumenes hauing not as yet put to Sea ; thought to doe somewhat vpon those that were so early in their diligence, before their followers should arriue to helpe them. Yet went he craftily to worke ; and sent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was belueued : and the Rhodian Admirall grew so carelesse, expecting still when he should receiue a watch-word from Polyxenidas, that hee himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauens. The Kings Fleete set forth from Ephesus by night ; and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in a harbour by the way, came the second night to Samos : where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Hauens. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauens ; so to guard the mouth of it : for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some Companies, in another part of the Island : which falling vpon the backe of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion : so as the enemies tooke him out of all order ; and sunke or boarded all his Nauie, save excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset vpon two poles, at the Beake-head : and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemy : who hauing not bethought himselfe what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gallies ; for feare lest they should burne together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleete.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest : whereof Polyxenidas could not take such aduantage as hee had hoped ; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, Hee was driuen backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they

they were not discouraged, set forth certaine other Gallies : the Romans also wishing, Eumenes repaired their fleet ; and all of them together, in great bodie, presented battail to Polyxenidas, before the Harbour of Ephesus. Antiochus durst not receiue them : they went from place to place, attempting many things, as by their thummes entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing : for this one while they were hindered by storms at Sea ; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land. Eumenes with his fleet was compelled to forsake them, and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdom. For Antiochus waited all the ground about Licea & Perisgamus ; and leaving his sonne Selenus to besiege the royall Citie of Pergamos, did with the rest of his Armie spoyle the whole Countrey thereabout. Licetius, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamos, having with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore hee had no longer stand in feare, being too much inferiour in numbers : there came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Achaeans : old souldiers all, and trayned vp vnder Philepatus, whose Schooller, in the Art of warre, Diophanes, their Commande was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walls of Pergamos, which was an high Towne, the danger of the Enemy, began to disdain that such men as they should hold them besieged. For Selenus his sonne, which was encamped at the hill foot, seeing that none durst fall forth vpon them, grew so carelesse : as other wise, than by spoiling all behinde their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrey. Diophanes therefore spake with Antiochus, and told them that hee would goe forth, encamped not farre from the Enemy : they of Pergamos thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they wondered what his meaning was : but when they saw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a test of his boldnesse ; and laughed to see with what an handfull of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned vnto their former negligence, and slouder. Which Diophanes perceiving, he commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they well might : and he himselfe, with the hundred Horse, brake out on the sudden vpon the Station where the next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their Horse ready saddled ; but more few, and none, had the hearts to make resistance : so as hee drave them all out of their Camp, and chased them as farre as he might safely, before they could get to the slaughter of them, and the losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamos, who had covered the walls of the Towne, men and women, to behold this spectacle, were very ioyfull ; and highly magnified the vertue of these Achaeans. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to helpe the Achaeans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Selenus escaped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than he had done before : and againe him went forth Diophanes the second time ; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had stayed many houres, looking who should begin to Selenus in that order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilst the Enemy was in sight : but as soone as the ground betweene them hindered the prospect, hee followed them in all haste, and soond ouertaking them with his Horse, charged them in Rere ; so as he brake them ; and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldnesse of the Achaeans, and the basenesse of his owne men, caused Selenus to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiatics, Philepatus had cause to tell the Romans, That hee could not thinke of their victorie. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his builldiers betooke themselves to Ryot, as it had beene in a time of great security, a good man of warre might haue cut all their throates ; euen as they were tipling in their vntowardly houses ; which Philepatus said that he would haue done, had hee beene Generall of the Achaeans, and not, as he then was, a priuate man. Antiochus was full of businesse : and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trouble, brought almost nothing to passe. Hee had beene at Pergamos, into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamos hee left his sonne as before hath beene shewed, to goe to Elaea : whither he heard that Antiochus the Roman Admirall was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There hee made an offer of peace : about which to confer, Eumenes was sent for by Amphilas, and came from Pergamos. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul, this Treatie brake off. Then followed

Hee also did the like, and aduanced so farre, that they might vnderstand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Armie consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vsually, were in the points, the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were diuided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at such distance as was vsuall; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achæans; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vnmost of all (saue some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troups of horse were placed there, though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him sixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would haue serued to discourage his men; as being sure to bee beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more couragious beastes: whereof Antiochus had likewise much aduantage in number.

The kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuersly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kindes, in such wise as each might be of most vse. The maine strength of his Foot consisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These hee placed in the midst, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirty in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beastes, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were sixteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choyce of the Countrey, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, diuided in their severall kindes, doe seeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue bin stretched out in Front. Adioyning vnto these, were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Siluer shields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as of the same name, that had serued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cirtæans, and Elymæans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of diuers Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with hookes or sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sat Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cicilians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrtæans, Elymæans, and many others, hauing also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Selenus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded ouer the Phalangiers.

The first on-set was giuen by the Dromidaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being liketo terrifie the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foote; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with flourings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driuen out of the field; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order, others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with such varieties of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance, but all of them fled, in a manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the king, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gaue vpon them couragiously, and forced them to retire. but M. Amilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach; Hee not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further tarrance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaile fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine about three hundred Foot, and foure and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night, hearing that Selenus was gone thither before. He left the custodie of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townes-men and Souldiers were so disinayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yielded vp themselves by Embassadours: whom they sent to the Romans, whilest they were on the way. Neither were many daies spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the king his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the answer, because that it should bee gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that Warre, they required fiftie thousand Talents: five hundred in hand, two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeeres next ensuing, by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, very earnest they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thas the Atolian, with some others who had stirred vp the King to this war, deliuered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily haue perceiued, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The kings Embassadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enioyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Vulso. The Atolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make warre vpon the Atolians; the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to bee so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Prouince changed.

Soone after this, came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea, by king Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to bee made with king Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approoued. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned vp his own deserts; and comparing himselfe with Masanissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was onely such in title; and since both hee and his Father had alwayes beene their friends, euen in the very worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what hee would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtisie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At the length hee craued they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Countrey by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giuing liberty to many of the Greeke Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had bene partakers with the king in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his ouerthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be true Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bin subiect vnto Philip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not alledged against him as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against king Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gaue away so much, that euery one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against king Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had bene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought conuenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victory had no lesse deserued; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

§. I X.

The Ætolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fuluius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtaines a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to haue passed the bounds appointed as farre to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Bookes of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

MARCUS Fuluius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided betweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparant, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Roman Asiaticke, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowly termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the Ætolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadors were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie, which was, to entreate the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neyther were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuise, euen vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied aduantage.

Poorer king Aminander liued in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that many of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing bene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuersed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, vsed by the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vndertooke the worke. Yet assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. Hee was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the ready assistance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Towns in the Countrey, to his vse. The same of this good successe at first; with diuers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giuing thereby some leisure vnto his King to pro-

uide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home sixe thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, hee left all saue two thousand behinde him, and so came to Atheneum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium awhile, to take a place lying ouer Argitheia, that was chief of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither hee, nor the king had the boldnes to descend vpon Argitheia; for that they might perceiue the Athamanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come downe vpon them; when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from wards Argitheia, & presently withdrawn by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Ætolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes, few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Ætolians hauing found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, & were lately taken by Philip, from whom they diligently reuolued and became Ætolian againe. The Dolopians lay next, that had bene euer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soone layed them away, seeing their neighbors ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their owne king so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the ioy was the lesse, for that neues came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Consul his hastie with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despiight, that hee had recouered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse; about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had bene the chiefe seate of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight vpon equal ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driuen from their new conquests by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who inuaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the Assailants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so bee driuen to leaue vnto his successeur the honour of finishing the Warre. Wherefore hee gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bade them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouerdeare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. Hee also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediatour, to put himselfe into Ambracia; and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnassurable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a very grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him: Heereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace; which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Ætolians were bound to vphold the Maiestie of the people of Rome; and to obserue diuers Articles, which made them the lesse free; and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece, they hauing beene the first that called these their Masters into the Countre. The ile of Cephallenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achæans, by stiffely pressing their owne right) that so they might haue possession along the coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbear the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was set down an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to haue the Romans Iudges of their controuersies, when they should arise. And hereof good vse will bee shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consull, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victorie, his acts were the confirmation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at Warres, without regard of the great alteration that hapned in Asia. From euery of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrells found occasion to visite those Prouinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. Hee was euen laden with booty, when, hauing fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long dominiered ouer the Countre: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their fore-passed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they did serue vnder king Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon the Riuer Halys, in an In-land Countre, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then there was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carrie or driue, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vndertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or easily bee repelled; and that finally, when hee had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greekes had beene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would haue serued well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of Armes, than impediment in disaduantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their stones before-hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensiu Armes, could not hold out against the Arrows and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driuen from a piece of ground, which they had vndertaken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steepe rocks. Few of their men did escape aliue: all their wiues, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation ouercome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them sauued themselves by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backs.

These warres being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul, his Prouince for another yeere. Fulvius, in his second yeere, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom he had vanquished, as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto hee swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, hauing set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellespont, laden with spoyle, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many yeers extorted, from the wealthy Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull vse, which the Roman souldier had bene wont to take as the onely good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household-stuffe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the seedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellespont & the kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his iourney homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with a huge traine of baggage, the Thracians could not so well contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that *Philip*ooke it otherwise than very pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, & well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne kingdome, if the people of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Ætolians, promising moreouer to restore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to giue away not only the halfe of Asia, but Chersonesus & Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained louingly the two Scipios, which he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into neer acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But *Eumenes*ooke a surer way. For the Scipios had not a disposing of that which they wonne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therfore saw these vpstart kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, aduanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that he had ioyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might haue bene freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentedness the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be vrged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleueed, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Country. They knew all aduantages; and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed: part was not yet so farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leaue behind: though both the getting and the saining, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew to night: & then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vnworthy commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that hee made good answer, and was approoued by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindred the peace with Antiochus; they

they said, That with much adoe he was kept from leading his Armie over Taurus, and adventuring upon the calamitie threatened by Sibyls verses, unto those that should passe the fatal bounds. What calamitie or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls propheticie threatened the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe over Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand won in a sort, the Countreies on the other side of the Mount, which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeede the accomplishment of this propheticie, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptolomie king of Egypt, that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, sowed at random in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolomie to his kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should haue any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers haue been well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that propheticie. Of the Sibylline prædictiones, I haue sometimes thought reuerently: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authority. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatry, that vpon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the books of Sibyl, had well preuailed vpon my credulitie, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparant, That not onely those prophesies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but euen the bookes of Hermes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever deuised them) by the vndiscreet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forrein proofs. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can bee more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue bene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosphers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it bene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then liued and flourished, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of Simoni Sango: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebell, had many ages before bene consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi god Sango, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them, it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sango, therupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Histori-call, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot bee safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred amonga few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last payment of those monies which the common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punick warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, euen so long as hee well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the the heat of an Inquisition, than raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they beganne, could not endure that such vnworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came, hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the midst of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the people, That vpon the same day, of the 10 yeere hee had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, & finished the Punick warre by a signall victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at these w^{ords}, but intended to visit the Capitol, and there giue thanks to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods; by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well & happily discharged this most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the seuenteenth yeere of his life, scilicet he were grow old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preuented the ambition of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the court, followed Scipio, leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their own slaues & a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, much to the very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vnrrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, & his vnthankfull Romans; that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Linternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many yeeres he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeere, in this voluntary banishment, it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopomenus, as also of his priuate behaviour at Linternum, render it probable, that he out-liued the Tribuneship of his accusers, who meant to haue drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Collegues (as one of them, had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. How soeuer it was, the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Asiaticus. They propounded a Decree vnto the people, touching monies receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should giue charge vnto one of the Prators, to inquire, and iudicially determine thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentious, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugall also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde he was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vnmisericifull and vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice, which being possessed with enuie, troubled both himselfe and the whole Citie, whilst he liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own ranke, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had bene at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periuire. That he had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold & siluer, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipio's, grew partly, besides his generall spight at the Nobility, from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandry (iudging Maximus to be no better in some peremptory manner, Scipio plainly told him, That hee had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurie: Wherefore, either not caring what lyes he published, or for want of iudgment, thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was in him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipio's, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuerer inquiry and iudgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was scene condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should haue been laid vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his hauing been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had been condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and Clients made such a collection for him, as would haue set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessary vse, being redeemed for him by his neere friends.

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punicke Warre. Security of danger from abroad; and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helpees to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselves within hear of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves ouer-matched by their aduersaries at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first, with clubs & stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frayes & murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two tonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sons, whilst they were but young, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senatous began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receive no Detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to haue wonne a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marinus, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the ciuill warres, which giuing vnto Sylla, who preuailed therein, means to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraign power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consul had finally cause to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in need of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cesar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailing against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate nor people, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall citizens, lost their owne freedom, and became subiects vnto the arbitrary gouernment of one: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleeued of her selfe as if shee had, whilst a king sat crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequele will discouer.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

§. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They dealt insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being vnreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius, of whom thenceforth hee becomes zealous.

After the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedonia, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arriuall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those fise Prerogatiues belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie, and to reserve (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeals, or last resort, as euery petty iniurie offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome; from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Offices of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the seuerall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grieuous; or, as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiefe hope of thriving; or, as being more fearful of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes liuing further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformance vnto them in matter of warre & peace, together with the diuersion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auailable to him, that his kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) werethey very louing vnto Masaniissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Africke: as likewise afterwards to the kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subiection vnto themselves, by the Ministry of kings; especially of such Kings, as were vsfull and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; & shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their estate, & a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not indure. Wherefore notwithstanding that he had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his country, prepared the wayes for them; and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them over the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselves.

These townes of Ænus and Maronea had bene part of Lyfimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Tranfyluania: in which Prouince it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold haue bene found, in the age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he liued not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Selenus Nicator by right of war, wherein he vanquished and slew Lyfimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolomie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Selenus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those haopes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaules being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had bene oppressed by them, recovered their libertie; and not onely held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, king Philip did provide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his kingdome; and by occupying Lyfimachia, with some other townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behooued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætoliens, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lyfimachia. Heereunto hee made a good answer, That his Garrison did onely saue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places vnable to defend themselves, and Gares, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his kingdome. But this Plea had not quailed him, in the disputation about Lyfimachia: & in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victory had gotten vnto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at libertie: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lyfimachia & Chersonesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges between him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Neuertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes, wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Ætoliens: wherein whatsoeuer hee had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either he was likely to preuaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had bene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselves, in pleading against him for their libertie, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little ioy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians clians by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done; but soile taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue bene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Maiestie, to an account. He would haue remoued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, others some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to enquire; among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who suruiued, were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more seuer, and more thoroughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not bene at Maronea, nor neere to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because hee should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him paysoned by the way. By this wee see, that the doctrine, which Machiavel taught vnto Cesar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing bene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, & were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before hee was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his younger son Demetrius as Embassador vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that hee had bene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate, as hauing bene well approued by them, when he was hostage in Rome; and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilst this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst hee, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had bene Iudges betwene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betwene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedæmonians against the Achæans. It was objected vnto the Achæans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walls of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prætor of the Achæans, made answer, That these banished Lacedæmonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame vpon others: the Achæans hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, they were supposed to be chief authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were comming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walls of Lacedæmon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibit vnto them all kindes of fortifications: as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vsurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walls and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycorgus his ordinances; and governed the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achæans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly tolde App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadors, That hee and his Countymen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer and giue account of their actions, as vassals and slaues to the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Achæans as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatness, and intimate, as they began, that the liberty of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Achæans haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, & which without perurie could not be violated; as reuerencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state vpon him; he pronounced more like a Master than a Iudge, That if the Achæans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and earne thanks whilst they might, they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This alteration was in the Parliament of the Achæans, which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet feare preuailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romanes to doe as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Romane Senate, very soone after, did make voide all iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Achæans vpon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedæmon, should be suffered to continue a member of the Achæan Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had beene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achæians, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slavery had the Greeks, & all kings and Common-weales whatsoever, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile & perswasion of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made mere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their private passions, & neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull seruitutie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greeks very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoever he should take armes, as shortly hee was like to doe. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie soone following. Hee had beene long vnto Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There, being confounded with the multitude of obsecrations, whereto his youth, vnskillful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer, it was permitted vnto him, to reade such briefe notes as he had receiued from his Father; and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreatie of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans, did increase in Philip his his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a ialousie of his too forward sonne. To let him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome, some bringing one commandement, some another; and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed vpon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that obserued his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that he had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than hee needed must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius was conuersant: rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the king, should not succeed vnto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by mere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this ialousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§ II.

19 The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Militarie profession is of all other the most unhappie: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to proue the contrary.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Achæans; that they seemed not vnlikely to take part against them, in any controuersie that should bee moued. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achæan Commonwealth, hauing long beene of a contrary Faction thereto, grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, severed from communion with any other. This was the deuice of some that were powerful in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might bee entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that blood should bee drawne, and either side so farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would bee left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prator of the Achæans, leuiued such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achæans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thracæ and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilst his horsemen were too earnest in following the chase, there arriued, by chance, a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that were fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopœmens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopœmen himselfe had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduentured themselves vnder his conduct. Hee tooke vpon him to make the Retreat; and suffering his Horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnghappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his Horse, and being with all in very weake plight of body, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleueed their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleueed, that he was hardly thought to bee in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ranne forth to meet him, him; and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue; and of the singular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuering them from Nabus the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Dionocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leaue any disgrace, or iniurie, done to him; vntreuenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had bene made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poyson, which Philopamen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, hee said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seuentie yeeres old, and weakened with long sicknesse, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achaeans, when they missed him in their flight, were maruellously offended with themselves, for that they had bene more mindefull to preserve their owne liues, than to looke vnto the sacrifice of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were doubting what to doe in such a case: they got aduertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadours were forthwith dispatched vnto Mellenae, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire meanes would not serue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Arme against Mellenae: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dionocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had bene partakers in this murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the ashes of Philopamen: and were carried home in solemne pompe to Mègalopolis; where they were all of them slain at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Scipio, the Roman Embassadour, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadours were seldom absent. Hee would haue entemedled in this businesse of Mellenae, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassadour to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the war against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spiteful enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Linus thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliuie to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betwene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuised some secret sallies vnder ground to saue himselfe from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to saue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as hee well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, hee rooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwaies preserved for a sure Antidore against the sharpest diseases of aduerser fortune; which being ready to swallow downe, he vttered these words: I will now (saith he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath so many yeeres possessed them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, diuine me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer bee numbred among the rest of his heroicall deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how faire the ancient Roman vertues degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their sweeteners, as, when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italie, and was ready to giue them battle at their owne dores, they gaue him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson:

son; where as these of a later race haue employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore bene one of their Consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith, and contrary to the Lawes of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliuer up his owne Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to reuenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyson, and died.

In this yeere also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Capitaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we haue now finished, had he bene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might haue commanded such supplies, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home, as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolue it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and Common-weale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and ielousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more vnprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Capitaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and ielousie of men, the spoyle, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as with good reason did Monsieur the Marshall of France confesse, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoeuer, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues, haue raised them aboue the leuell of their inferiours, and haue surmounted their enuie: yet haue they bene rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Linius, L. Emilius, and this our Scipio, whom wee haue lately buried. Among the Greekes wee reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that David bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Iob. With this fare Alexander feasted Permenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Etius: who, after many other victories, ouerchew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was stricken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, beside runne-awayes, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Etius, hee had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slue Etius) murdered the Emperour; which hee neuer durst attempt, Etius liuing. And; besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Etius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolued than obscured. The same vnworthy destinie, or farre worse, had Bellisarius; whose vndertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and hee died a blinde beggar. Narjes also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iustinian. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well obserued in euery age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed a Turkish one. That euery warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Vissers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsaluo, who draue the French out of Naples; and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to wear garlands on. And that the great Capitaines of all Nations haue heene paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary it may be said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue beene giuen, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Licutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traiterously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the aduantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vnderferuedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatness of their warlike vertue, is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous crueltie, seldome found in any other than cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Iustine, hauing recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastatius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surprised his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastatius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue beene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriving, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vnthankfulness in this kinde, hath beene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wise man therein, and hee deliuered the Citie by his wisdom: but none remembered this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to haue beene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser sort of them think to fauour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes coufused and abused; which proues that weaknesse to be in them indeed, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thanks; yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines haue made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the enemy, they are very inquisitiue to search into it, and to strip the well-deseruers out of their gettings: yea most iniquiously to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, haue purloyned somewhat from the common Treasure. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipio's being so lately recited.

In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie, she was constrained to vndertake, her Maiesty had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had; yet, according to the destiny of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admirall excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Maiesty had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witnesse, who in all her dayes neuer receiued dishonour, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and employed.

For as all her old Capitaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randel, Drewrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunstable, Bourchier, Barkley, Bingham, and others:

so those of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norrice and Vere were the most famous, & who haue done as great honour to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: those (I say) with many other braue Colonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauels and wounds) no title nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Maiesty in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleeue other men than her selfe, a disease vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue beene subiect, I say that such a confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weakenesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Adversers are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which Martiall men seldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a profession farre more noble than their owne, seeing therein they should onely minde their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deservings, and of farre greater vse than themselves.

But his Maiesty hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honoured more Martiall men, than all the kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable seruice, as well in the yeere 1588. as at Caliz, the Islands, and in our owne Sea; hauing first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maiesty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Ruffel, Carew, Danuers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their governments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§ III.

Philip making provision for warre against the Romanes, deales hardly with many of his owne subiects. His negotiation with the Bassarne. His crueltie. Hee suspecteth his sonne Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slaine, by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sonnes death; whom hee findeth to haue beene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

Quintus Martius the Roman Embassador, who trauelled vp and downe, seeking what worke might bee found about Greece, had receiued instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not seeme to haue discovered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enioyned him; yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessity should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was deuising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnesse to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) by what meanes soeuer. Hee was in an ill case: as hauing beene already vanquished by them, hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto yrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet he prouided as well as he could deuise, against the necessitie which he daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romanes, he compelled to forsake their dwellings, and remooued them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured against against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, hee deuised vpon alluring the Bastarnæ, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the riuer of Danubius, to abandon their fear, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Country. These were like to doe him notable seruice against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefit that could bee hoped by their arriual, must be the vtter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwaies troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoever they found aduantage. Neither was it iudged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarnæ, by hope of spoyle, and other inticements, vnto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peradventure some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarnæ from their owne habitations, into the land of the Dardanians, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious iourney vnto them, that carried with them their wiues and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any ciuill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect: so as the Bastarnæ came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time hee neglected not the training of his men to Warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wils to forsake their ancient dwellings, & betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meet for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within words: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also hee did vnwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparant. This euill therefore would soone haue bene determined, had not his cruell and vindicative nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from iust sorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly did seeke reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deseruedly. This increased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall, when the King in a most barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom hee had inured, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill hee should haue massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical than perhaps hee could haue desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romanes intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the kings younger sonne. It may well bee (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius, like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreame ieaousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romanes, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparell, or the vnslightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were lected at in ordinary discourse and table talk, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praying them, euen in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conuersation with their Embassadors, as often as they came, gaue his father cause cause so thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder sonne Perseus, who fearing so much lest his brother should step betweene him and the succession, converted wholly vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty yeeres old, of a stirring spirit, though much defectiue in valour. Demetrius was younger by five yeeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought olde and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free speeches disclosed. The daubous head of the King hauing entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was vnto to be made at certaine times with great solemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft intwaine a birch, and threw the head and fore-part, with the contrail, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way, which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the kings of Macedon, from the very first of Ignatall, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the king betweene his two sonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into three parts: which, vnder the Kings two sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vsing poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-carnestly seeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with those stakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was sorry for this, as it had beene some bad preface; but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vfe. They were of the craftier sort: who perceiuing which way the kings fauour bent, and how all the courtes of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their seruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heate of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feaste his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to obserue what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indiscreetly, that he was taken & well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doores. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion; excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet hee would leaue notice of his traine behinde, but forced them all to beare him company. They, feasting to bee ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked vp his doores, as if hee stood in feare to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondred to see himselfe excluded, and feared very angrily with his brother. But Perseus bidding him bee gone as an enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the king. The elder brother accused the younger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged; and in effect the same hath bene here recited; saue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, & would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romanes; by whom hee knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romanes did hate him; because hee bore a due respect vnto his father, and was sorry to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For prooffe hereof he dired a letter, sent of late from T. Quintius to the king himselfe: whereof the contents were, That hee had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further doe well to send him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honourable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence bee enforced, That this counsell was giuen by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should

should have vpon his brother to Rome, and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become seruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Persus, that conuicted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him, He said, that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wise from their opinion of his death: so as by an impious practice; Hee were more like to lose it wholly, than to increase it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The king pronounced like a father, though zealous father, that he would conclude nothing vpon the excess or error, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one hours audience of the matter, but vpon better obseruation of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seeme to haue dealt both iustly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gaue himself ouer wholly to Persus: vnto so little conference with his yong sonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him present, nor neere vnto him. About all, he had especiall care, to learne out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintus, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philotes and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interessed in the quarrells betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince, with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices vnusurpable, against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect, for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abetter, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the king, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didus, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if he had pitied the estate of the vnhappy Prince; and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to liue in safety, from his father & brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reuerfion vnto the Crown of Macedon. Whatsoeuer his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didus; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, & in the meane while reuealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his sonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a prooffe sufficient, at least, of the kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didus therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings vnadvised sentence, first gaue poyson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Heereupon he sent a couple of Russians, to finish the tragedies, who villainously accomplished their work by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not bene found a king, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houses of Lyfimachus and Cassander felt either with themselves, or euen vpon their heeles, by intestine discord and ialousies, so grounded on desire of soueraigne rule, or feare of losing it. By the like vnnatural hatred, had almost bene cut off the lines of Pholomis and Seleneus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously distemperd. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that wplart family of the kings of Pergamns had raised himselfe to maruellous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of meere slavery; whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples, but is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children; as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainly hee had reason so to doe: not more more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith king Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minoeritie. But he was himselfe of an vnnmercifull nature; and therefore vnmet to be a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed vpon many innocents, both strangers, and subiects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded him with a draught of his owne Poyson. After the death of his sonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bene objected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriuer of the whole processe. His onely remaining Son Persus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remooue of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romanes were now no lesse to bee feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vsuall trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making prouision against them. Hee was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betweene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the king a deepe melancholy; and filled his head with suspicious imaginations, the like whereof hee had neuer bene slow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hateful to Persus: and thus becoming subiect vnto the same ialous impression which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsaillour, when he found that the anger conceiued against Persus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the king, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philotes and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flamininus, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery, in the businesse: made diligent inquire after the truth. In thus doing, he found one Xychus, a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vsed by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying, That this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to vtter what he knew. Xychus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself, that he had bene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme; when he vnderstood that by the vnnatural practice of one sonne, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the authors of the mischief. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philotes was taken: and either foras much as he could not denie it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guilty; or else was put to torture. Persus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flye the Countrey: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the kingdome, towards Thrace, whilest his father wintred at Demetrius. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngacious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weake body, and excessive griete of minde, so disabled him in the trauell thereto belonging; that ere he could bring his purpose to effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, hee might thanke his own peruerse condition: since his Vncle, king Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires; if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was iustly punished by feeling the difference betweene the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which hee affected, and the the life of a king, where of he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen while yet he was onely drawing neere, was fore-signified vnto Perseus, by Caligene the Physician; who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse improuidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Bastarne fell vpon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his reigne. Some warres of the Romanes: and how they suffered Masaniissa cruelly to oppresse the Thracians. They quarrell with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Acheans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romanes discover their intent of warring vpon him.

IMmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Bastarne into Thrace: where order had bene taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrey. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as no other was known than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should bee done, or sustained, for his seruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all dash and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarne would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part hauing lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Bastarne had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, receiued by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreame bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seemes that by the carelesse vsing of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countrey.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a war so dangerous, as that with the Romanes was likely to prooue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his minde to the settling of his Estate: which well done, hee might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To win loue of his people, he sate personally to heare their causes in iudgement (though herein he was so ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceiued this his vertue of iustice to be no better than fained); as also hee gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. About all, he had care to auoid all necessity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league, which he obtained, & was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, & other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, he became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeede the mastering passion, which ouer-ruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discerne which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For prooue of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romanes continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Isria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrells, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victory) a heavy hand: & suffered Masaniissa to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romanes. Masaniissa therefore had great aduantage over them, and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force; of what heuer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romanes not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrey of Emporia: and so did he vse them againe and againe, with pretence of title, where he had any; or otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masaniissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Masaniissa take from them by force: and by the Romanes (to whose iudgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this iniury, when Masaniissa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them about fiftie Townes and Castles; without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romanes. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniissa, inuading their Countrey, howeuer he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romanes, they durst not presume to beare defensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to bee eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romanes indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might haue fairer iustice, or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauor, that the Romanes yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masaniissa should bee allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romanes would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Iudges; than continually to liue in feare; and hence otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hanginan. And herewithall the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping, in hope to moue compassion.

Here may we behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines, of their resolution, in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they had oft chased; slaine, taken, & sold as bondslaves in the Streets of Carthage; & in all cities of Africke & Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often & so earnestly desired. Onely they want peace with Masaniissa, once their mercenary, & now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they; & adore the Romanes, whom they see flourishing in such prosperity as might haue bene their owne. But the Romanes had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battel at Cannae, than Hannibal that won it was vsed by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed euery man of them, all his private riches vpon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publick, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreame want, to set out an Arme into Spain, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne walls: These were the Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging vnto the vanquished. Their pitifull behaviour had merited some compassion: yet their retires may seeme to haue bene instituted, as proceeding no less from enuy vnto the Romanes, than from any feeling of their owne humilitie. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought.

of detending their owne right by armes: but contrariwise, when without leaue obtained they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they receiued a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craued audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming, and had related vnto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadours thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not giuen him instructions, how to deale in this businesse. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell diuers nights, in the Temple of Esculapius: whereupon he himselfe was so dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be ouermuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoeuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the couenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to inioy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to send Embassadours, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romanes were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vantage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should be vanquished, he made none other account, than that all Africke round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been vnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behaviour. These hee entertained kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) hee perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bastarnæ were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did vnto other some. Where he did harme to any; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, (vpon what occasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed so farre, vnlesse either they had beene extremely prouoked, or else were secretly animated by the Romanes. Whatsoeuer it was that bred this courage in them: Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romanes tooke very angrily this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had innaded some Countrey of their Italian confederates, & not corrected his owne rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians, whereunto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselves haue done the part of Masanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league between them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greeks, & generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes: whom vsually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoeuer they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achæans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordinary fauour at Rome caused them them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre, T. Quintim rebuked them, as for arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carry any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuerthelesse vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in vsurping the practice of Armes, which belonged onely to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vntoward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Romane Senate, being desirous to humble the Achæans, refused not onely to giue them such aide as they requested; and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a carelessse insolencie, reiected this honest and reasonable petition. That the Enemy might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argiues, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians, would reuolt from the Achæans; they themselves would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was beleueed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romanes. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achæans had vtterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no towne rebelled from the Achæans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie,) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained grauitie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of Warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against meere strangers; without interposing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peradventure sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Romane Arts howsoeuer many (for gainefull or timorous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neither subiects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Antiochus: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence strove to preserve their liberties and lands, from confusing by piece-meale: they were to bee deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vnpliant, and wherein many of the Greeks began to haue affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow than to breake.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, wherinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Romane patronage. Indeed they not onely perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves grieved with the present subiection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrey, and would for no ambition, or other seruile respect, be flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domestically conspiracies would soone be at an end; when honestie and loue of the Common-weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly aduertised: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traitors; of whom euery citie in Greece had too many; as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truly, or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from these that are feared or flattered by many. The Achæans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callierates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceiue the aduantage, which mischieuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callierates was in such wise transported with ambition; that he chose much rather to betray his Countrey, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence, and alleaging what was meetest in iustification of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Achæans and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the sealing of their authority, among his froward Countrymen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee in regard; any intunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achæans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not bee so, if Hee, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wills: who ceased not to asseigne, That no Columns or Monument erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to bee of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to giue care vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which vndertooke the maintenance of an argument; seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase apace, & they became the preualent faction. It was therefore strange how the Fathers could so neglect the aduancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiesty. More wisely, though with seditious & rebellious purpose, did the Greeks: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for hauing vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these & the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolved to follow this good counsaile, in every point; yea to depreesse all those that held with the right, and to set vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto all cities of Greece; requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedæmon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callierates; they aduised all men, to be such, and so affected, as hee was, in their seuerall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callierates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Countrey into the way of ruine; but himselfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheless he forbore to vaunt himselfe; of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Onely hee so reported his Embassage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherewith he threatned those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Achæans: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serue to manifest his ready obsequiousnesse vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatning termes won many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Persens on the other side, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promises, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honestier than his enemies had. Thus were all the cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting onely the good of the Estates, wherein they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable, That a king, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall affoord them iust occasion to make warre vpon him. Persens hauing finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a iourney to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his Armie along with him; yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his iourney, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoeuer, done by his father, might bee buried with his father; since his owne meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could haue bene pleased better, if hee had behaued himselfe after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken such a iourney, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heape of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Achæans: which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was iealousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, giuen them cause to abhorre him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, beene to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall consent, they resolved to forsake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preservation of concord among them, to vse all circumspection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Warre, and when all danger of inuouation was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leauing means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the kingdome of Macedonia: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their matters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaues very profitable vse. But Persens tooke hold vpon this occasion: as fitly seruing to pacifie those, whose enmity faime he would haue changed into ioue. He therefore apprehended all these fugitiues, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achæans, That as for good will vnto them, hee had taken paines to restore back their seruants; so should they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that heereafter they might not run away againe. His meaning was readily vnderstood, & his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearsed by the Prætor, before the Councell. But Callierates took the matter very angerly; and bade them be aduised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine deuice, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Heerewithall hee tooke vpon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achæans before-hand acquainted with the Warre, that was coming vpon Persens from Rome. Hee told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romanes; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly hee rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romanes, the invasion of the Bastarnæ, vpon the Dardaniens, the kings iourney against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi, & finally, his peaceable behauiour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the euent of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Heere to good answer was made by the Prætors brother: That Callierates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the kings cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renewed his league with the Romanes; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that he had louingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so: why might not the Achæans, as well as the Atolians, Thessalians, Epirots, & all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuerthelesse Callierates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-stiffly gainsay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answer made the whilest, That since the king had onely sent a letter without an Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus herewith not contented, would needs vrge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to giue audience: which was prooue sufficient to one that could vnderstand of the condition wherein they liued. For harkening to this aduice of Callierates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassadour: whereby it became apparant, that the Romanes intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The vnusall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt vpon Eumenes. The brotherly loue betwene Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his deuice to poison some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

Polyb. Legat. 56 & 59.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had beenetroubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romanes: by whom hee was animated with comfortable words, and promise, That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesse, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this, being at good leisure, he began to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore he was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romanes, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonian, it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigall in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to waxe euery where stale: whilest Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuy borne to the Romanes, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignitie, He stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping the rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore & indirect courtes of reuenge. The Lycians could not be saued by his patronage, from seuerer and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodians. This rendred him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achæans, as too vnicursured, misbecoming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his desertings. All this (which he needed not to haue regarded, had hee not beene too vainely ambitious) besell him, especially for his being ouer-seruiceable to the Romanes, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse heereof; hee thought it in vaine to strue any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauour. And therefore he resolved cuen to ouerturn the foundations of this popularitie, by inducing the Romanes vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian kingdome, which all so vainely worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the kingdome, as he had beene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermeddling in businesse of neighbours, his riches, and his great provisions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended into particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and six thousand Horse, of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians, his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as hee should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen, either to liue vpon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subjects. Heerewithall hee prayed them to consider, that king Seleucus the sonne and successeur of Antiochus the Great, had giuen his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That king Prusias of Bythinia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus, and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loath to vtter it plainly) That cuen the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied, or iustified (as, that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romanes, & that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; since it would be to himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the staff of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romanes, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to beleue that the Romanes stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should set vpon them in Italie. Neuerthelesse forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so that hee told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadors, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostility against them; their iniustice, and oppression, would haue beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this iustification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; they more than vsuall curioisitie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand

was well knowne, helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speake, and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to haue disclosed all: when the warinesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearfull apprehension; against which, it behooued their wisdom to neglect no possible remedie. Wherefore carelesse audience was giuen to the Rhodian Embassadors, who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer beene, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conueighed by sea vnto Perseus, his bride Laudice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were setting themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange news, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as meere vassals, but as dependants and associates. For prooffe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the tenne Embassadors; whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against king Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masaniissa, The Ætolians, and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subiects, had cause to finde themselves agrieved if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subiects might easily be made their fellowes, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was onely to plague the Rhodians, for their good wil to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more neerely touched themselves. Rather they honoured the king so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassager they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to finde cause of anger. For whereas at other times all cares had beene taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That king Perseus desired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might fauour of hostilitie; but that, if his trauaile in this kinde proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrarie to expectation. These bigge words may seeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction giuen by the king, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weaknesse of spirit, vnanwerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subiect (in appearance) to fortune; which might haue beene his, had he knowne how to vse it.

Now that this brauery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the kings owne heat; it appears by his daring to adventure soone after, on a practice that so more iustly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer shew of reason to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in turning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to doe the murder: who placing themselves, behinde a broken mud wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised with great stones, and left for dead. They might haue finished their worke; such was the opportunitee of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because hee should not discouer them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Ile of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as King, & either tooke or would haue taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonice the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue; That when the King returned aliae home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, receiued none other checke, than that hee should forbear to marrie with the Queene, untill hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in speciall fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By such concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus raised and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon haue been, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saued all from discouerie. But as he was deceived in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was Hee beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For Hee had writtento one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he sent about this businesse: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundisium: who comming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassador, and therof discharged himselfe. Brundisium was the ordinary Port, for ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journeying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needes doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the king should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. Hee durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should be tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at liberty, he discouered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the king had neuer seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such obiections were not to be made vnto a king, to proue the rightfulnessse of making warre vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in iudgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger prooffe (which might haue beene easie) than any that wee finde by them produced: yet the base & cowardly temper of Perseus was very suteable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such priuate offences, it gaue him no priuiledge: they iudging him to haue offended in the nature of a king. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not send men, to waste the kingdome of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the king? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe

it by poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse hee would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to haue bene so confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enemies more calme. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that Hee had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue stood vpon the euidence, brought against him by Rimmius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well-beloued, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meere spies. Finally, he promised to giue them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeed onely for feare: but wished them to descend to more equall conditions, wherupon he, for his part, would aduise, as they might also doe for theirs.

In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is set downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future, excepting those which he immediately performed. But Linie inserts a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden, to make any war abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had bene restrained by plaine covenants. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensie armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very iust reason to finde himselfe aggriued. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whilest they themselues were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that inuaded Macedon? By such allegations hee maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as vniust; he ministred occasion vnto the Embassadors, to giue him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message; he commanded them to be gone out of his kingdome in three dayes. But either he should haue bene lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serue him to vndertake the warre; hee should courageously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediately, whilest the Enemy was vnprepared; not haue lost opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

S. VI.

The Romans sollicit the Greekes, to ioyne with them in the warre against Perseus. How the Greekes stood affected in that warre. The Timorousnesse of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador deludes him with hope of Peace. His forces. He takes the field, and winnes part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this warre. Of Tempe in Thessaly, and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might haue had; but lost by his feare. Perseus braues the Romans; fights with them; knowes not how to use his victorie; sues for Peace; and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus hauing the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Boetians rebell against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the warre against Perseus. They vex the Greekes their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes provision, hauing heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans bene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that well might they haue bene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others; who must afterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonians: such was the diffention betweene their seuerall Estates; howsoeuer the generalitie of them were enclined the same way. Neuertheless Embassadors were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to bee denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtesie: and vnderstood that not only such as made refusal, but euen they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly, were lieto heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans: the Achæans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtful, euen when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their ductie. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to set vpon the side, whereof they gladly would haue seene the ruine. The vulgar sort was euery where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though Hee iudged the victory of Perseus, like to prooue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romans ill to thriue, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeouours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears, that an extraordinarie feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vndertaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not onely to his owne kingdome, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speake the enemy faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery small thing would serue to terrifie him; & consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by

by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leisure vpon those which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few Townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, hee sought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martins, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finenesse in cunning than was vsuall among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the Kings desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the king intreated, and obtained a meeting at the Riuer Peneus. There did Martius Very gently rebuke the king, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned: Whereunto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conueniently bee done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the king lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might haue done much, ere the Roman Armie could haue bene in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, hee no way increased his forces; hee suffered a most conuenient season, of winning vpon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bene with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation betwene him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superior in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betwene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, hee should be denied peace. These were poore helpes. For hereby it appeared, that his lye standing vpon point of Honour, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the utmost of his ambition. This his fearefulnesse might seeme excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessitie, that was partly of their owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion; to giue such a manly beginning to the warre, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more auerse from him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Boeotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonians, renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yeelded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused their severall Townes to make covenants apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebell) haue such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This worke, of separating the Boeotians from Thebes their head, was more than Agesilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedaemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with king Perseus, against a number not so great, as followed the Lacedaemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the king sat still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the Citie, where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprooued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne; the Senate being resolved before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie; & had thirty dayes respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the vsuall place of giuing audience to open open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serue onely to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest; but it was a likely meane, both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Romane Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their king at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue roused Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he contented to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with some part of his kingdom, that so hee might enioy the rest; than to put all at once to hazzard. But finally, the stoutest counsel preuailed; which also was the wisest, and so would haue proued, had it bene stoutly and wisely followed. Hee now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendezous at Citium, a Towne in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, whereof about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with liuely speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his prouisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their feuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but answered, That his owne prouisions would abundantly suffice, willing them onely to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Theffalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Country, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Theffalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wonne by force. Of these last was Mylæ; a Towne thought impregnable, & therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a fallie; which the Townesmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of war was practised here: to the greater terrour of the obstinate. So Velatæ and Connus (townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the king marched onwards to Sycurium, a town seated on the foot of mount Ossa, where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him onely two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Theffalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the feuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masaniissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his yong sonne, there to be brought vp: yet he did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had bene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romanes. Antiochus and Ptolomie (though Ptolomie was then yong, and vnder Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to inuade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romanes, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian;

yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a pretty trick, wherewith M. Lucetius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfeit good wil. This king had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the haue of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucetius tooke away, after a very kind fort, making shew to beleene, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoeuer Gentius thought in the beginning, he foolishly lost both his kingdome & himselfe, in the end of this warre; by offering, rather than giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painefull iourney, through the mountainous Country of A-¹⁰ thamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great ouerthrow. Hee refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where hee then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the country. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a be-²⁰ nefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines Ossa & Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurres or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vntill they would make an hungry iour-³⁰ ney, thorow the country of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might haue had, if by mis-spending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done farre greater things, had he seized vpon the streights of Aons, which his father once kept, and defended all the Countrey behind the mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans haue either trauelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to be found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, vnto the mercie of Seas that were very dangerous; if hee would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses⁴⁰ they once deuised; notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps bee said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too far from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Aetolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as wee shall finde anon) euén as soone as they met with Perseus. The Boeotians, how politickly soeuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrell; what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodi-⁵⁰ ans, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after a while began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, than they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well-willers, yea & bought downe with money (as he might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; & to render the liberty, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginary. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue bin expected expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperati-¹⁰ on to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to auoid the danger of that warre, whereof he should haue sought the honour; he left his friends that would haue stood by him, & gaue them cause to provide for their owne safety: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, hee chose rather to set his backe to the mountaines of Tempe, & defend himself with his proper forces, than to be driuen into such miserie, as was inuitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that hee kept his footing in Thessa-²⁰ lie, it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches, & lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore he inuited the Romanes into the field; by wasting the land of the Phereans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduenture euén vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terri-³⁰ fied; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Capitaine; and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his bold-⁴⁰ nesse much increased; and much more his reputation: to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The Towne of Sycurium, where Perseus then lay, was twelue miles from the Romanes: neither was there any conuenient water-⁵⁰ ring in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but hee was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not bee both wea-⁶⁰ ry and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconueniences, hee found out a lodging, seuen miles neerer to the enemy: whom hee visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His comming at such an vnusual houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessarie, and resolved to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore hee sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: hee himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedo-⁷⁰ nian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retrait) with little losse of his owne. But hee discovered his weakenesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne tem-⁸⁰ per. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their campe, and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnfit for: he neuertheless tooke it for sound aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which meanes it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would ex-⁹⁰ alt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it beene greater, and had hee wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue beene the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euén when he had the victo-¹⁰⁰ ry, what else did hee, than proclaime vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yeelding to the Romans, whensoeuer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victory would ad-¹¹⁰ mit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twenty horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remooue to a surer place beyond the Riuer Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud tearmes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the Riuer in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Aetolians were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especiall marke, had been obserued to bee the first which turned their backs: an obseruation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shunne indignation, or incurr fauour, then must they aduenture no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, he not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could neuer haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or giuen better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to haue rowted them whilest they were conueying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue beene done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoyles of them without resistance, as yeelding themselves ouercome. With such braue words did the king fet out the glory of his action; diuiding the spoyles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor sound. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamp'd at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betwene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuerthelesse he was easily perswaded to vse the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent vnto the Consul, and offered to yeeld vnto the same Conditions, wherein his Father had beene bound to the Romans, if the warre might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a truce, whilest Embassadors might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approue the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none, save that Perseus would yeeld both his kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to bee so resolute in aduersitie. On the other side, it argued a faint heart in Perseus, that hauing receiued an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the king withdrew himselfe backe to Sycyrium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misaganes the son of Misanisus, with the aide before mentioned. This distance betwene the king & them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged all ouer the fields. Their carelesse demeanor gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which he attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe hee thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers, he had a good hand vpon them, if hee could haue withdrawn it, and giuen ouer in time. But whilest he strooue to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul, by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon, as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appeare hereafter. Hee left all behinde him, save onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Connus, hoping to haue taken it, it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe vnto the Perthebians and others, from whom he won some towne, & among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry towne thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme not to haue belonged vnto the Thessalians, vnlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defectiue. One may thinke it strange, that the Boeotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Nautie on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom these dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petty townes; which by that same distraction of the Boeotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to haue beene sought among the changes, happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly punished by Eumetius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoiling them, that hee would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreame oppression hee could haue driuen them to faine. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in generall; That in the warre which hee made, hee cruelly and couetously demeaned himselfe.

Liv. lib. 43.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hosilius the Consul, and Horrensus the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hosilius shewed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the war against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman war vpon his kingdome, after that the Consul had sought passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeede on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Armie of foure thousand, and who, by leuies made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Viscana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; sallied forth vpon him, ouerthrew him; and chased him so farre, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Viscana shortly after became Roman: which howsoeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, reuolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painefull journey into Aetolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, he tooke in Aperantia, and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleuas, one of his Lieutenants. Such successe had the Macedonian warre vnder Hosilius. The same Consul offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors traueiling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches, tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to aduance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achaean horse, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honorably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue beene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no color of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such a tale; it was thought better for the present, to let it alone, & giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Aetolians: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councell that approued the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriotes, making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flattery; rating them openly, in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, euen in presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselves, as men that could beleene none ill, though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconueniences. But they that standing on priuiledge hereof, refused to fulfill euery commandment, were numbred among the Patriotes, which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worse, than to haue bene Traytors. The Senate was driuen to set downe this order; by reason of the many & vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, & especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great sum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to haue their subiects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redresse of iniuries, or to offer their seruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets, and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the towne Rome, & appointed anniuersarie games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddessse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolomie, & the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the shamelesse flattery of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, diuine honours; when hee sees a towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a goddessse, and receiued (without some of the giuers, or shame of the Present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

§ VII.

Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extreame difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Diem quitted by Martius; re- paired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent Embassador to Martius from the Achians. Polybius his honest wisdom beneficiall to the Achians. King Eutimenes grows awrie from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus, and Eu-menes. His false dealing with Gentius King of Illyria; whom he draves into the Roman warre. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodians; who vainely take upon them to be arbitrators betwene him and the Romans. Perseus loseth a mightie succour of the Bosphorus, by his wretched parsimonie.

After two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had bene thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he liued in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, tooke courage daily, and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the warre might proue, and thereupon to become wise for themselves. Contrariwise, Lisinius & Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon, and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by very many losses receiued. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselves, that many Townes, euen of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Romans side; and the Arme much lessened, not onely by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himselfe (for they laid the blame one vpon another) in licencing the souldiers to depart. Quintius Martius the new Consul, who succeeded vnto Hostilius, was to amend all this: which neuertheless was more than hee knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supply of men. Hee began hotly to set the warre on foot, which a long time had slept. And hee began the right way: not seeking to force the streights that were surely guarded, but taking pains to climbe the mountains which were thought able to forbid all passage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way hee meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be discouered by the Enemy, or to breake through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they should haue that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed to make a safe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedi-dit foot, to discouer the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in ouercomming the difficultie of no more than fiftene miles: after which they had light of the Enemie, that lay to denie their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and sent backe word to the Consul, where they were; intrating him to hasten vnto them: which hee did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arriuall, but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front.

So that very few hands came to bee employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Martius tooke the onely course remaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men hee left with 30 Popilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whilst hee, with the rest, fetcht a compasse about, and sought out wayes that neuer had bene troden. Heerein hee found extreame difficultie: which notwithstanding hee overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such iourneys, through places vnfit for habitation: hee was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea, where Nature might seeme to haue intended, that none should bee. So steepe hee found the descent of the mountaines, in this way which hee tooke: that of euen miles, which they trauelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe;
as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that stood one ouer another, so vpright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were affraid of the giddy prospect, and casting their gouernours, made a 40 terrible noyse, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Hauing therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grievous iourney; there was nothing more desired by the souldiours, than that they might bee suffered to creepe backe againe, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliffe, the other sustained by two long postes, fastned in the ground below. Vpon these two postes, or poles (which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should bee either cut or broken) were fastned two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, betwene the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one bridge might reach vnto the beginning of another. These were covered with planks and turfe; that they might seeme continent with the ground; so to make the beastes aduenturous to goe vpon them. If there were a plaine of any good extent from the foote of a rocke, to the next downefall; then might the bridge bee shorter.
When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, vpon one of these; the posts vpholding the frame were cut asunder; thereby causing him to sinke downe vnto the next bridge; whence hee was conueyed in like manner, to the third, and onward still to the ve-ric bottome. Thus went they downe sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an euen valley. By this it appears, how thoroughly provided the Romans

Romans vied to be in their iourneys; as things needfull in all occasions: as also what inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conueyance of themselves, and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested, staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should haue overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies iourneys were like vnto the first: saue that custome, and the neerenesse to their waies end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men vpon the passage, three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might well nere haue heard the noyse. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that hee neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out, but as one void of counsaile, sat hearkening after the event. Four onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus, which the Romans were vnable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seeke any other way, must bee faine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, saue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the Riuer Helecon becomming there a lake, and called Baphyras, took vp the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily haue bene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the midst of Tempe; a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurs of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew nere to the very bankes of Peneus, a goodly and deepe riuer which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had bene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome iourney: if Perseus could haue scene his owne aduantages. For the Roman Army was not onely in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauaile: but must needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to return the same way that it came, if the King had made good the streight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants & carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemed a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy from aboue their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdom had often bene inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were arriued, there was no meane to escape, without enforcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. For hee no sooner heard that the Enemy was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; than hee feared like one out of his wittes; saying, That hee was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry away in haste; and straightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, hee sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soone after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the damage. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blinde obedience; or Andronicus, for his careful prouidence, merited the greater commendation; or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their seruice was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hasty direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diuing; were payed their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are priuie to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone surely to worke, worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacite. Hee thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Asclepiodatus, from defence of the passages, where-to they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance; and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing trauelled about a dayes iourney, and gotten one towne that yeelded, he was compelled, by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne back towards Thessaly. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the warre: but hauing left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had bene careful to occupy one of the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might corne be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was most desirously expected, he forsooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish iourney (if not worse than foolish) hee lost more, than a little the longer fasting had been worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had bene madnesse to put himselfe on such an enterprise, so slenderly prouided, as that without enforcement, or sight of the Enemy, hee should be faine to quite it. Howsoeuer it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behooued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe, vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore meanes as haue been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dis-mantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the Riuer of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue bene enough, not onely to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the warre vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Onely the towne of Heraclea, standing on the riuer of Peneus, fise miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not giuen vp for feare. After this, Martius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the king further off: although his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to prouide for his wintering. Hee sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the Sea-Towns, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times aduentured forth of the Towne, were still put to the worke. As for the Towne it selfe, there was danger in comming nere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the walls, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ran along by Enia, and Antigonca, (landing nere to each of them, and both doing and receiuing hurt) vntil he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There king Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre; and fise other were sent thither from king Prusias. With this access of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were were arches in the town-wall filled vp with that earth, and couered with one single row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by fapping the walls. To this worke he appointed such as he thought meetest: giuing an alarme to the other side of the towne, thereby to shadow his attempt, the breach was soone made. But whilest the Romans were shouting for ioy, and ordering themselves for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceiued what was done; and sallying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch and the wall, of whom they slew about sixe hundred, and suffered few to escape vnwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. 10

 Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not onely sufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Meliboea; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without work) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddenly ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Campe on fire.

Polyb. Leg. 80.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their ability short of their Enterprises; euer since their Consul (whether daftardly, or carelesly) most vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is exprest in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Agessipolis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclaea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeite. And so were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him, not onely for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherein he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated: though 40
 the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so vnable to inuade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreame danger; so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had beene taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had beene driuen from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Polyb. Leg. 87. m

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himselfe like a man of warre: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craft-master, with a restless working diligence. This indeed neither proued his sufficiency, nor commended his honesty: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheless, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such delight as weake and busie-headed mentake, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Countrey. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hosilinus, had gotten much reputation, and 50

was thought likly to inuade Thessaly; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Achæans, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Achæans should send their whole power into Thessaly, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadors vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure, Polybius found the Consul busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the Armie; and awaited the Consuls leisure till they came to Heraclaea, where finding the time conuenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein soeuer it should bee commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but said, That he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achæans, siue thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if hee were strong in field, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achæans be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; mauling and vnable to resolue whether it were for lone to the Achæans, that the Consul was so earnest in this businesse; or rather for enuie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as hee was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was giuen him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuate, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alledging that he had no need: In this case therefore, hee had recourse vnto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Achæans were sauers, of more than an hundred and twentie Talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeeres imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that king Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this king began when it was too late, to stand in feare 40 lest the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerway all other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martius: but coming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as hee did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that hee refused to leaue behinde him certaine horse of the Gallo-Greeks, being requested to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romans good seruice: then is the reason apparant, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. 50
 But it is more generally receiued, that Eumenes gaue a willing care to Perseus his desire of accord, for meere desire of gaine. And it might well be, that couetousnesse drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsoeuer it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that hee was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertisements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betweene a king and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vsed the helpe of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith hee willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, hee requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more neerely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answer; he began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was affraid. Wherefore he promised, for his own part, That if he might haue fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend vnto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receiue the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no neerer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserued somewhat, howsoeuer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needs he would haue part of his wages in pres. Thus the two kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner delt Perseus with king Gentius the Illyrian. Hee had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stirre. Hereunto Perseus loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten with in Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all his Armie might haue comfort, by such access of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors; gaue an answer as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vain-glory of the Rhodians was thoroughly chastised; and more thoroughly should haue beene, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the War by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprovident. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the young king, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed vp with the scale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a petty king, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gaules, which were were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bassarna. These had before-hand made their bargaine, and were to receiue present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captaines to come visit him, whom he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to giue the souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy master; That the Gaules will not stirre one foote further, vntill they haue gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus heereupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men so wisethat they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an inuocatie against the inciuilitie and auarice of the Bassarna: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fiuethousand horse of them, hee said would bee as many as hee should need to vse; and not so many, that hee should need to feare them. It had beene well done, if any of his countailours would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Armie of them, since without any danger to the kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perthæbia, into Thessaly: where wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoyle, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want, therein doing the king notable seruice, whether they wonne any victory, or not. This, and a great deale more, might haue beene alledged, if any man had dared to giue aduice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had bene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those many thousands that had bene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those siue thousand, whom the king would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceiued, that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifiting excuses; the Bassarna returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than hee could haue well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preferue his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painfull Office he was very soone discharged by L. Amylius Paulus the new Consul: who in fiftene daies after his setting forth from Italy, brought the kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a king so foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Amylius Paulus the Consul. His iourney. Hee forceth Perseus to discompe. Hee will not hazard battaile with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moone. Amylius his superstition. The battaile of Pydna. Perseus his flight. Hee forsakes his Kingdome: which hastily yeelds to Amylius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yeelds himselfe to the Roman Admirall, and is sent prisoner to Amylius.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity so moued them, that either * they decreed that Prouince to L. Amylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthy a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. Hee refused to propound vnto the Senate any thing that concerned his Prouince; vntill by his Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly knowne to be such, as hath been already told; the Senate appointed a strong supply, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Naue, and likewise to the Armie that lay betweene Illyria and Epyrus; from which App. Claudius was remoued, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Amylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that did thinke themselves with enough to manage this Warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouern their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by heare say, and censure by idle reports: for hee told them plainly, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Amylius, who died valiantly in the Battaile of Cannæ, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Amylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his iourney; with an especiall hope of men, that hee should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more than could haue bene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the wind came faire, he set sayle at brake of day, and arriued safely at the Isle of Coreyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in five dayes more. So are there but five of the fifteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium; hauing spared no labor of men and of women to fortifie the bankes of Enipeus, where it was fordable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, & much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were tenne miles betwene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betwene the Sea shore and the foote of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amylius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not aboue the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging any neerer to the enemy, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the riuer of Peneus; where hee had watering at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of any worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonian; as it presently did; the passage onward being defended as hath bene already shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage over Olyntus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire iourney. Martius either had not bene informed hereof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the aduenture; they fearing lest it would prouee such a peece of worke as had bene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie, to command. Hee had reformed, euen at his first coming, many disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the souldiers among many other good lessons, to bee obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had bene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about five thousand men to this enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio, Aemilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darknesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the Fleet; where victuals were provided for their iourney: it being noyed, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the Country. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay, rather to diuert the kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprife, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Channell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-well neere all day, yet inferred not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Waggoners employed none save his Yaltes; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at some distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Tower which Perseus had rayled on his owne banke, did alight vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Amylius persisted as he had begunne, and continued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to reach the Macedonians, that some greater worke was in hand: soe as who soeuer a good Captaine, as Amylius was knowne to bee, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such brauidises, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men that came running fearefully down the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith giuen to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good success in their iourney. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came somewhat neerer to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrows and slings could doe little seruice, were beaten at handy-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them haue bene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon; which had bin effected by Martius in the yeere fore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting for such an opportunitie.

Perseus was in an extreame doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: hauing bene taught by the last yeeres example, how resolute the people were in making defence; but farre worse counsaile prouailed; as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazzard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselfe into any one Towne, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are iealous) not ouer-carefully reliqued. This was euen the same that Amylius, or any invader, should haue desired. So a place was chosen neere vnto Pydna, that serued well for the Phalanx, and had, likewise on the sides of it, some peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There hee abode the coming of the enemy, who stayed not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the kings Armie, which, with greater feare than discretion, had hastied away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately: doubting lest otherwise the king should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul, praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Amylius told him, that he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their iourney; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile, gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out and entrenched behinde the Armie, whereinto, at good leysure, hee fell backe, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall to blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the king, hee excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemy; who advanced no further, but kept vpon ground seruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere bene Praetor, foretold vnto the Consul, and (with his good liking) vnto the Armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to bee the same night: willing the souldiers not to bee troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might bee knowne long before, it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beate Pannes of Brasse and Bisons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, wherein they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause any alteration in ciuil affaires, & matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of obseruation it is, how superstition capriuates the vnderstanding of the wisest, where the helpe of true religion is wanting. Amylius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the 10 Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor above the reach of humane vnderstanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with any deuout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his duty to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice his deliuerie, as soone as she shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish deuotion; yet it is like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules, which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any Sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrailles of the beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was 20 found a promise of victorie to Amylius: but with condition, That hee should not giue the onset. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had bene better to call vpon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically) vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no iniunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaile; Amylius was throughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise hee would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leysure serued to retyre whither hee listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that hee might wait vpon aduantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would bee much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Amylius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer-earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the ruer, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the Water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne side. These fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His COUNTRYMEN seeing this, hastened to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the ruer. Heereupon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaile, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flatte leuell, saue that on the sides a few hillockes were raised heere and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and Consul encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the lesse maruaile, that hee durst aduenture battaile, since hee had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose vnseasonable deuotion could bee no better than hypocrisie. For hee that will pray for a good good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the king returned to the battaile, he found it no better than lost: and hee, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The effects of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse on wards, and bent off all which came before it, as Amylius was thereat much astonished; That the Pelien rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them slaine, and the squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduersely to the Romans, and which the Consul beholding, is said to haue rent his coat-armour for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his deuoyre; the victorie might haue bene his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaile, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost the impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battallions pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worse) that some files hauing open way before them, should aduance themselves beyond the rest, that were held at a stand. This coming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by 20 the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction giuen by Amylius, when he saw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vnequall, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx proued vnauailable against many small squadrons, as it had bene formerly in the battaile of Cynoscephale: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnseruiceable against the other, by reason, that being not euery where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though here were little such inconuenience of ground, as had bene at * Cynoscephalia.

Perseus, when hee saw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne againe towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner vnouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good seruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who slew about twenty thousand of them; though hauing little cause to be furious, as hauing lost, in that battaile, onely some fourescore, or sixe score men at the most. Some of the foote, escaping from the execution, ouertooke the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company disperfed themselves: euery one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their king, the number began within a while to lessen. For hee fell to deuising vpon whom he might lay the blame of that dayes misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella; he found his Pages and household seruants, ready to attend him, as they had bene wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnseasonable admonitions, hee stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischiefe: he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Euan- 40 der (who had bene employed to kill Hyemenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about 500. Cretians, more for loue of his money than of him. To these he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though shortly hee coozened them of some part thereof, making shew as if hee would haue redeemed it, but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where he exhorted the Townes-men to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euan- der to speake what himselfe would haue vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves.

Vpon

Vpon the first taine of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth vnder colour of a gainefull employment, & shutting the gates after them. And now to be ridde of the king, they plainly bade Euander to be gone. The king hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which he had there, in certaine vessels that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where hee hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the king make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Amylius, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was neereft at hand, was the last that yeelded. About fixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had beene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yeelding themselves and the Towne of Beræa, whither they had retired out of the battell. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole body of all ense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the king had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman Armie. Amylius sent abroad into the Countrey, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. Hee sent these letters by person of such meane condition; that his case was pittied, for that he wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of this writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in termes ill becoming a king; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could bee expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might be sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuerthelesse, in this conference, hee was maruellous earnest, that hee might bee allowed still to retaine the name of king. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preferred his Treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and to bee called King. Yea it seemes that hee had indeede, euen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the Warre, he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his kingdome of Macedon, for * such a paltrie Iland; and for that he offered to lay vp the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrge him to giue place vnto necessitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arriues at Samothrace C. Octavius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who assayes, as well by terrible threatnes, as by faire language, to draw the king out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, hee had now alreadie imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like priuiledge of Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of king Eumenes at Delphi: This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the king, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleere himselfe in iudgement, hee must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Maiestic, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with with the same crime. But what will this auaille, when the minister of the fact being brought into iudgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore willed Euander to haue consideration of the little fauour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be presidents and overseers of this iudgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause; where though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander seemes to like well; and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deserting the sun, as it were to get poyson, wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had stucke to Perseus in all times of neede, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leaue him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holy Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will asseme to much, who shall dare to gainsay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which preferres him from captiuitie, he purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroander, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship; who easily was perswaded to waite the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could be so conueyed, was carried aboard by night; and the king himselfe, with his wife and children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by a rope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroander there: the Cretians had played a Cretian trick, and he was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to wake cleare day, whilest Perseus was searching all along the shoare; who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging; and thinking it not safe to enter in the common way, lest he should be taken; he hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquire, till Octavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoeuer, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victory compleate. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than of reigning therein, he might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by diuiding his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrary hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; he is become a spectacle of misery; and one among the number of those Princes, that haue beene wretched by their owne default. He was presently sent away to Rome, before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abied qualitie, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Amylius vied to him the language of a gentle Victor, blaming him; though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answer might haue beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearefull silence. He was comforted with hope of life; or as the Consul feared it) almost assurance, for that such was the mercy of the people of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, & respectfully threatened, he was committed prisoner to Quintilius.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after foure yeeres continuance: & such end there withall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

Gentius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

* Called now Sensari.

ABout the same time, and with like celeritie, Antius the Roman Prator, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius, had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fiftene thousand, with which he was at Libsus, ready to assist King Perseus as soone as the money should come, wherof he had received onely ten Talents. But Antius arrested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him; and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was very defendible by nature, besides the help of fortification; & strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme vnpowable to be wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Antius was confident in his late victory; and therefore presented his Armie before the walles, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselves within the Town, would needes issue forth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors, by whom, at first, he desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadors, to haue recourse to such meditation. But he thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison; where they were still slid. Having obtained three dayes respite, he passed vpon a Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately, though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caracanthus was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish, as to returne into Scodra. He sent Messengers craving access vnto the Prator: before whom hauing lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) he fell downe humbly, and yielded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, friends were presently giuen vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun vntill Perenna, one of the Embassadors that had beene imprisoned, brought word from Antius how all had passed,

How the Romans behaued themselves in Greece and Macedon after their victory ouer Perseus.

NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune, and to look tyrannically vpon those that had beene vnmurderly toward them before, whilst the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with a bad grace, saying that they were sent from Rhodes to make an offer of peace; forasmuch as it was thought by that this Warre was no lesse grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians; and many others; but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Macedonians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassyage to Rome, not for loue, of Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken by these threats, and the desire of some outrageous of the charge) to haue Warre, and word against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene any any whit auerse from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for feare; whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would haue done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vttered a milde sentence, and aduertised the Senate, That in decreeing warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedy to ransacke, than any iust cause, had moued them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any marke remained aliue, saue those that had beene of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the society of the Romans: a fauour which till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it, as equall friends.

apud Calist.
conuincit. Ca-tilinam.*

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Aemilius himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them vnderstand what power he had ouer them. More than fise hundred of the chiefe Citizens in Demetrias were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with help of the Roman souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redresse was such, as requited not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, he feasted like a king, with excessive cheere, yet so, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending prouisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome, some, to giue order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was vsual in such cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The kingdome of Macedon was set at liberty by Aemilius and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had beene payed vnto the kings, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest, the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent captiue into Italy, with their wiues and children, as many as were about fiftene yeeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new giuen by Aemilius. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue any inconuenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subiects to Rome; the things done to them could deserue no better name than mere tyrannie, yea, and shamelesse periury; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from euery quarter, as had any way disscouered an vsuericeable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome, where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: & in that respect, though they were no subiects, yet wanted there no colour, for vsing them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for hauing beene openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the king: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achæans these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, hauing no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vntreatable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achæans could be suspiciously charged to haue held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had beene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their seruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to vse the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season serued fitly to ranke the Achæans with the rest.

And

And hereto Callierates was very vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, he and his fellowes should be made to pay for their mischieuous denices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callierates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perseus. This being so; he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, hee would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, wee will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise haue bene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassadour laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited about a thousand; willing them to appeare and answer before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Country, to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, & regard of the publike liberty, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honestie had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrey, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achæans, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after seuentene yeeres, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian, was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or hauing made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome; or whether out of layle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserue the Macedonian Treasure whole, yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gaue order, That the whole Country of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Emylius with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; hee sent vnto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of euery Citie. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Siluer which they had; and sent along with them, into euery of their Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Capitaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, euery one the Towne wherein he was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiers; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserved punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had bene already sent into Italie, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleue it, had any one Writer deliuered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that God was pleased to make Emylius childelesse, euen in the glory of his triumph, how great soeuer otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians.

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

The warre of Antiochus vpon Egypt, brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

Antiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reigne and life. Hee died the sixe and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the seuenteenth or eighteenth of *Ptolomie Epiphane*s: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Iustine) of Iupiter. He left behinde him three sonnes, Seleucus Philopater, *Antiochus Epiphane*s, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom hee had giuen in marriage to *Ptolomie Epiphane*s, king of Egypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes, reigned in Syria twelue yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was sloathfull by nature; so the great losse which his father Antiochus had receiued, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this iudgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall start vp a wilde person, unworthy the honour of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, & other to the same effect: What time as the holy City was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Macchabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apolonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the king to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the kings death, and of his successor *Antiochus Epiphane*s. It is therefore from the reigne of this king, that the books of the Macchabees take beginning. Which books seeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of *Antiochus Epiphane*s, the brother and successor of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Macchabeus (who died in the hundred threescore and seuenteenth yeere of the Greeks in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second booke, although he take the storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian reigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Iason the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, preuailed with *Antiochus Epiphane*s, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius king of the Spartans sent Embassadours to the Iewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greeks, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome, repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereof Iosephus adds, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embassadour was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, & were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her clawes.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded *Antiochus Epiphane*s, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother, which also he vsurped from his brothers sonne.

Ptolomie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had bene about seuen yeeres King of Egypt.

*Ptolomie Epiphane*s, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt foure and twenty yeeres; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his kingdome between them, whilest he was a childe. But they found such other businesse ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolomie, the Prouinces of Coelosyria, Phoenice, & Iudæa, which he had won by his victory ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolomie adhered to the Romans: whereby he liued in the greater securitie. He left behinde him two sonnes; this Ptolomie Philometor, and Ptolomie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolomie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subiects, & was like to be chased out of his Kingdome, his yonger brother being set vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing succour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vp on him the protection of the yong Prince, sought by all means possible to possesse himselfe of that kingdome. He sent Apollonius, the sonne of Mnesibemus Embassadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to assist the kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouvernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the king his Nephew with the principall places of that kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephewes safety and well doing. And the better to answer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came hee alongst the coast of Syria to Ioppe, & from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Ierusalem, where, by Iason the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) he was with all pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouvernour of Coelosyria and Phoenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heauen; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angell of God, and recouering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threescore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Iason, and his being ouer-reached by another in the same kind, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achæans, when as that mischieuous Callicrates, who had beene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

*One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
One wolfe than other Wolues does bite more sore;
One Hawke than other Hawkes, more swift does fly.
So one most mischieuous of men before,
Callicrates, false knaue as knaue might be,
Met with Menalcidas more false than he.*

And euen thus fell it out with Iason: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iason thereupon being forced to flye from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phoenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty army of land forces, He went about to raigne ouer Egypt, that hee might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Naue, and moued warre against Ptolemæus King of Egypt, but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death.

He won many strong Cities, and tooke away the spoyles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled

Prophecie of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Promises, and hee shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victory ouer the Egyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For he gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolomie, betweene Pelusium and the hill Cassius, after which he entred, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went up towards Ierusalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlesticke for the lights, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Pouring Vessels, and the Bolles, and the golden Basons, and the Vaile, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Siluer, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Coelosyria, iustifying his title by the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerring, that this Prouince had not beene consigned ouer to the Egyptian, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achæans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by feuerall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receiue their king his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolomies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine war, than by the terror of his armes, threatening destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leauing the Ptolomies in very weake estate, the yonger almost ruined by his inuasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weake soeuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a iourney into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the kings, called Antiochis. For Gouvernour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an In-come, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lyfimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioyning. This hee did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Sositratius eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iason) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacriledge of Menelaus, he reprobued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adioyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had aboutten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweete Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a maner, abused to lust & other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo & Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holinesse of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Onely I lay for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is farre lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to iudge this fearfull shift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore olde man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when hee came to Onias, hee counsellled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; so hee slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousness. Hereof

when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, He took away Antiochus his garment of purple, and rennis cloathes, and commanded him to be taken out the Citie; and in the same place where hee had committed the wickedesse against Antiochus he was slain as a murderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should haue thought that this wicked king had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolemie, a Traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, hee condemned innocent men to death; who iustly complained against Meneleus, and his brother Antiochus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outrageous will, and not by any regard of iustice: since he reuenged the death of Onias, yet slew those that were in the same cause with Onias; who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Seythians, they should haue bene heard as innocents. By reason of such his vnkindnesse, this king was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, in stead of Ephianes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then vera there scene throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, forty dayes long, horsemen running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of spearmen, and as troops of horsemen set in array, en-countring, and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather fore-awar-nings of God, all Histories haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destructi-on of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a star in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens di-rectly ouer the Citie, after which there followed a slaughter like vnto this of Epimanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny tels vs, that Armies were seen fight-ing in the ayre from the morning till the euening.

In the time of Pope Iohn the eleuenth, a fountaine powred out bloud in stead of water, in or neare the Citie of Genoa; soone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens; with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vipera hath collected ma-ny, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to mee most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the Off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, tooke end; whereof this notable signe gaue war-nings.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a faire encrease of white Poult-rie; and from the little Branch there sprang vp in time a Grove of Lawrell: so that after-wards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vseto carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; & after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were offered, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to be vnwor-thy of regard; it appears by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was mentioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agree-ment. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not strong enough to sette his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Vncle, thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terror of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitie of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since no-thing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to bee hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpe, and aboue all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in A-lexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him ear-nestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he stood of his Vncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his armie, yet had hee left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne vse. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in answer to all Embassadors, yet he now prepared to make a sharpe warre vpon them both. And to this end he presently furnished and sent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Coelosyria, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Em-bassadors sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather be pleased to signifie what he required to haue done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That hee would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territorie thereto be-longing: and that he should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that hee had vnto either of them, for euer. For answer vnto these de-mands, hee set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphis, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie iour-neys.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iust cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it would bee much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuerthelesse, the E-gyptian kings being reconciled, and standing ioyntly in need of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable be-nefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had bene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes bene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry peo-ple abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continu-ance of suitable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde, especially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeere since: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Achæans they desired in parti-cular, that Lycortas the braue warrior might bee sent vnto them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, Generall of the Horse. Hercunto the Achæans readi-ly condescended: and would immediately haue made performance, if Callierates had not interposed his mischieuous art. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his ob-sequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce; which was, That their Nati-on should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, bee ayding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee said) conuenient time to entangle themselues in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans, what helpe fouer should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigg words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martin

the late Confull had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foot, and two hundred horse, might well be spared; to the ayde of their Benefactours, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Achaens could without trouble, raise thirre or four thousand Souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed, he brought into the Theatre where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Achaens were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadours to set Egypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeede sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Achaens should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends, durst not gaine-say the Roman Councell; which had force of an iniunction. So the kings were left in much distresse, disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassadour sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately given by the Senate, vnto those Embassadours of Physcon and Cleopatra; which hauing stayed more than a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadors deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no lesse than his Brother and Sister.

In this ambassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had beene before three or four yeeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Euleus, or Lemeus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layed) which had the gouernment of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not onely hee determined to set vpon Antiochus, for Calesyria: but would haue interposed himselfe betwene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitratour; though it fell out well, that his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to liue vnder protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subiects, he might haue seemed to stand in no neede of such protection, he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister, shewed it selfe, euen in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heads and beardes overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliue. Thus they entred into the Senate; and there fell, groneling and prostrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not so meane and mournfull, nor their looks and Countenances so sadde and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Countrey stood; they made a pittifull and grievous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwaies remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heere tofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authoritie, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vnder-taking vpon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of Egypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vsed any delay; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra, be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lennus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the warre betwene those Kings. In commission they had first to finde King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus, and to

to let them both vnderstand, that vnlesse they surrendred, and gaue over Armes, they would take that King, not more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vnsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrian Embassadors, tooke their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was he to the end of his iourney, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Roll of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius: That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after hee had stayed and pawed a while, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe whatsoeuer the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling euery particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Ierusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene historified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed awhile, and settled the kingdome of Egypt, leaving it vnto the elder brother, and appointed the yonger to reigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they felt, as it had beene, in the power of the Egyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian ships.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Rustias, Maianissa, and Corys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instabillity of Kings Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius, with the Conclusion of the warke.

BY this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedonia. The same Popilius had beene well contented, a yeere before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Achaens and Stolidians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King of Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed any menacing termes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo-greekes, which molested him. Very welcom was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bade him be confident, and request of the Senate his brother's Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee either approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaimer by the faithfull counsaile of Stratus a Physician; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vp-right. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had beene sent; recounting his owne seruices done to the Romans in the last Warre, where withall hee forgot not to make of his brother as good mention as hee could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Achaia and Adramyttion might be bestowed bestowed vpon himselfe. *By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore to make him vnderstand how gracious hee was, they not onely granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue vnto him (as was their custome to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuertheless, Assalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the liberty of Annus and Maronia: thereby making vnesseuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gallo-greekes, which were about to inuade the kingdome of Perga 20 mus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Persens, hee had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne doores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemy, that came to visit them in loue: neither could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no king should 20 be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias king of Bitbynia had bene at Rome somewhat before; where hee was well-commended after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entering into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kissed the threshold, called the Fathers his gods and sauours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaues newly manumised, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a slaue, and one that by such abiect flattery kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Persens had bene charged. His errand was, besides matter of comple- 30 ment, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whom hee brought with him to Rome, there to receiue education. Further petition hee made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the grant would haue bene vniust, hee receiued a cold answer. But concerning the Wardshippe of his sonne, it was vnderaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But about all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to 40 him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue iudgement on his side: and whereas he had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay siue hundred Talents to the Numidian, for hauing hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leysure to deuise vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masanissa himselfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Persens; and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for ioy vnto Iupiter in the Capitol. His 50 good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to stay at Rome.

Corys the Thracian sent Embassadors, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him, giuen to Persens, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages, and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Persens, might be set at libertie, for conuenient ransom. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Persens, by giuing hostages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ransom-free; with admonition, to carry himselfe better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betwene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those vnhappy kings, Persens and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emylius and Anicius. Persens had often made suite to Emylius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still receiued one scornfull answer, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant; that he might kill himselfe. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than he found, he would rather haue sought his death in Macedon, than haue bin beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemencie, 10 whereof Emylius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow king, had bene led in chaines through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe sacrifice, he should command the captiues to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honor of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were ouercome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Persens: yet so, that he had little ioy of his life; but eyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuersly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sons, two died; it is vncertaine 20 how. The yongest called Alexander (only in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a loyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe vnder the Roman Officers. In such pouertie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eight-score yeeres after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Persens had known it before, that his owne sonne should one day be compelled to eame his liuing by handie-works, in a painfull Occupation; it is like, that he would not as in a wantonnesse of Soueraignete, haue commanded those poore men to be slaine, which had recouered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diuing. Hee 30 would rather haue bene very gentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most vnderroden wretches, are all subiect vnto the One high Power, gouerning all alike with absolute command. But such is our unhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Do as ye would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; we entertaine that arrogant thought, I will bee like to the most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

—vv— Et qui nolumus occidere quemquam Pesse volumus—

Euen they that haue no murders will, would haue it in their power to kill.

40 All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to do euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. God, who best can iudge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other heereenesse in blood, be driuen to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most vn- 50 worthy of his whole house, yet reigning ouer all? The vntimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such flattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Heereunto may be added, That the heyre of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that unhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subiect, subject, as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the quill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so do they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happy that Countrey is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That * God is the forest and sharpest Schoolemaster that can be devised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without contemplation to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Amylius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintus Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyle; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thence forth, vntill the ciuill Wars which followed vpon the death of Julius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue bin hindered by the souldiers, who grudged at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Ringers of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by seuer exhortations. Thus Paulus enioyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuerthelesse, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not given in adoption: of which, the one died five daies before the Triumph; the other three daies after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the ioy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About the same time, Othavius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enow to say vnto Rome, Sume superbiâ, Take upon thee the Maiestie, that thy deserts haue purchased.

BY this which we haue already set downe, is scene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field, hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaues shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, & conquering Nations, haue bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which haue bin preferred, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragicall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, these great Lords of the world haue bene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often bene dangerous to the liuing, so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreame ill bargaine of buying this lasting discourse, vnderstood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather haue wished, to haue stolen out of the world without noyse, than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and cruelty: by giuing in spoyle the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sort of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatness nor continuance) there hath bene no State fearefull in the East, but that of

of the Turk; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moores out of Granado, haue made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, & by the many kingdoms which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoysed by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as haue bene spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defensiu Warre, and in diuersions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeeres, or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to liue in peace, but all their swelling and ouer-flowing streames may be brought backe into their naturall channels & old bankes. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, & to be regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof; the one to ioine all Europe to Asia, the other thereof of all Europe to Spaine.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath bene already said; That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwaies laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the experience in themselves. They neglect the aduice of God, while they enioy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleueed; God, which hath made him, and loues him, is alwaies deferred. I haue considered (saith Salomon) all the works that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, and vexation of spirit: but who beleuees it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the first, made him enioyne his sonne Philip to restore Nauarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that iustice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrières, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepassed happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iust, and mighty Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre stretched greatnesse, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hic is ceter.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it selfe, The first part of the General Historie of the world, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and haue hewne out; besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspokeable and neuer enough lamented losse, hath taught me to say with Iob, Verba est in Lucrum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To the Reader

The use of Chronologically Tables needfull, to wit: For those, that reach to any length of time; and those of all, to wit: that are most generally used, since the birth of the world; yearly set down, in a convenient and coherent. This here following, may serve to an end, to wit: the present Part of this work, pointing out the several dynasties, that having fallen out at the time, are yet to be discovered in the Relation. Certainly it is not possible, whether we think, that any can be. For how could the pieces of the first Patriarch's year, seeme to have bene well where each pleat, yet in the times of the Kings of Judah and Israel, was made many Nations, and the last year of years, of one King reckoned up to the next, and so on. This sume is most likely to have fallen out in many other dynasties, but for the sake of the Reader, I have added the same, and amperly set down the years, which were in the same sume, and into the winter, and so breaking the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small piece of trouble, to think of so many, and so many, and so many, as have already been written, what may probably be held for true. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alleged, because of such error, as a more intence and perfect Calculations shall happen to find hereafter. I may serve to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane judgement) from any notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, even in that regard, not only for some errors of the presse, in the numbering of yeeres, but for some halfe mistakes of mine owne; which I desire to have heereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if hee be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The Titles over the Columns, have reference to that which followes under them; as will readily be conceived. Where two Titles or more, are over the head, as ^{Rome} Nabonassar there doe the numbers underneath answer proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319. yeere from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Ichosaphat beganne his reigne in the 3774. of the Julian Aera, in the 3092. of the world, and in the 99. yeere of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To avoid prolixitie, I have forborne to insert those yeeres, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reigne; some change of Government; some Battaille fought; or the like. So, of the 3. yeeres wherein Syllius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note onely the first, that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of Ichosaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Syllius Auentinus succeded, and wherein Ichoram first reigned with Ichosaphat his father. For I thought it vaine to have filled up a page with 12. lines of idle cyphers, numbring forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Auentinus, and the 17. of Ichosaphat. In setting downe the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one what place hee held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fift, sixteenth, or so forth, in rank, of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeere of his reigne; as the end, or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned, in the spaces following under yeeres of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeere of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there it is to be understood, that the same yeere belonged, not onely to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more, of his fore-goes: as the first yeere of Ichoram King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab. So, where two or three names are found in one space; as in the 3077. yeere of the world, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri: it is meant that every one of them reigned in some part of the same yeere, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the yeeres of the Egyptian Kings are set downe the yeeres of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, other whiles, the day, the month upon which Nabonassars yeere began, which, how it varied from other yeeres, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Aera, or account of yeeres, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place was, in the Booke it selfe: so as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeere of that Olympiad: as that Cytus began his reigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeere thereof.

Now, for that the yeeres of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in Aprill, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their severall Columns; opposing part of the one yeere to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more trouble some than usefull; since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and Sec lib 2. chap. 3. 5. 6.

To the Reader,

Since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needfull to observe, that how former the Aera of the Olympiads be 34 yeeres elder than that of Rome, and 29. than that of Nabonassar, yet the reigne of someking may have begun at such a time of the yeere as did not come with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficultie. One familiar example may explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her reigne the 27. of November, in the yeere of our Lord, 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, new donne Images, and reformed many things in Religion; all in her first yeere: yet not all in that yeere 1558. but the greater part in the yeere following; whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25. of March. The like may be assembles found in this Table; but so, as the difference is never of a whole yeere.

The Julian Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the years of the World, was delivered by that honorable and excellently learned Ioseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian years, now in use among vs. It consisteth of 7980. yeeres, which result from the multiplication of 19, 28, and 15. that is, of the Cycle of the Moons, the Cycle of the Sun, and the yeeres of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present years; or if no fraction remains it shewes the last yeere of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498. of this period, when we fought the great battell of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun 18, and consequently the Dominical letter F, as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This Julian Period, after the present account, alwaies exceeds the yeeres of the World by 681. Besides the former style, and other theses redounding, it is a better Character of a yeere, than any other Era (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position.

Adore I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explanation of these Tables. Neither was there much requisite to such as are conversant in works of this kinde: is sufficient if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.

CHAP. I. Of the Creation and Preservation of the WORLD.

S. I.
That the invisible God is seene in his Creatures.

S. II.
That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the World to haue bene created by God.

S. III.
Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. 1. 1.
S. IIII.
Of the meaning of the words [Heauen and Earth,] Gen. 1. 1.

S. V.
That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Inform and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

S. VI.
How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

S. VII.
Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne; and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

S. VIII.
Of the Firmament, and of the Waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there bee any Crystalline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

S. IX.
A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

S. X.
That Nature is no Principium per se, nor Forme, the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

S. XI.
Of Fate, and that the Stars haue great influence: and that their operation may diuersly be prevented or furthered.

S. XII.
Of Prescience.

S. XIII.
Of Providence.

S. XIII.
Of Predestination.

S. XV.
Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, & against Reason and Providence.

The Contents

CHAP. II.

Of Mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

S. I.
OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

S. II.
Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sinne.

S. III.
Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof, should yeelde to the immortall soule.

S. IIII.
Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

S. V.
That Man is (as it were) a little world:
with a digression touching our mortality.

S. VI.
Of the free power, which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himselfe.

S. VII.
Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the vniuersall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

S. I.
That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken, and that it is no maruell that men should erre.

S. II.
A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

S. III.
That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrey of Eden.

S. IIII.
Why it should be needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradise.

S. V.
That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

S. VI.
That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought, making the Ocean to bee the Fountaine of those foure Rivers.

S. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the ayre.

S. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise under the Equinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

S. IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coelestia, there is a Countrey in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esay 37. and Ezech. 27.

S. X.

Of diuerse other testimonies of the Land of Eden: And that this is the Eden of Paradise.

S. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one streame.

S. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian soyle, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

S. XIII.

Of the river Gehon, & the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush, 2. Chron. 21. 16.

A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

S. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material tree:
and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

S. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

S. III.

Of Becanus his not vniuersally allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

S. IIII.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euil: with some other notes touching the story of Adams sinne.

CHAP.

Of the first Booke.

CHAP. V.

Of diuerse Memorable things betwene the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

S. I.

OF the cause and reuenge of Cains sinne:
and of his going out from God.

S. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod:
and of his Citie Enoch.

S. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

S. IIII.

Of the diuersities in the Age of the Patri-archs, when they begate their children.

S. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

S. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

Of the men of warre before the Flood.

S. VIII.

That the Gyants, by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diners in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Relicks of Truth touching these ancient times, obscure-ly appearing in Fables and old Legends.

S. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

S. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

S. III.

That in proceesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse superstitions of the Egyptians.

S. IIII.

That from the Reliquis of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first I.

dols & Fables were invented: & that the first Iupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain &c.

S. V.

Of the three chiefe Iupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

S. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, wherof

S. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

S. VIII.

That Heathenisme, and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder Iulian miraculously confounded.

S. IX.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill, to maintain his Kingdome.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Flood.

S. I.

OF Gods forewarning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

S. II.

Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

S. III.

Of Deucalions flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood, nor the Vmbri in Italy a remnant of any vniuersall Flood.

S. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the uniuersall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

S. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue bene fore-scene by the starres.

S. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the vniuersall Flood:
and what are Catacætes Coeli, Gen. 7. 11.

S. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

S. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke:
as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

S. IX.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacity.

S. X.

That the Arke rested upon part of the Hill
Taurus

The Contents

Taurus (or Caucasus) betwene the East Indies and Scythia.

†. I.

A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, That the Arke rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

†. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion: They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

†. IIII.

The second Argument, That the Easterne people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

†. V.

The third Argument; From the wonderfull resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument; From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

†. VII.

Of the senselesse Opinion of Annius, the Commenter upon Berolus, That the Arke rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia; & yet upon Gordiaei, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.

The fift Argument; The Vine must grow Naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole Earth.

†. X.

An answer to the Obiection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia; and the height of the Hills there.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills than the Armenian.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia unto the place noted in the Text; and that it is no marvaile, that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along, and euen in India, be called Ararat.

†. XIV.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucafi, and toward the East Indies, and of other excellencies of the soyle.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first Planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sonnes of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Iaphet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

S. I.

W Hether Shem and Ham were elder than Iaphet.

S. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and, that the knowne great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

S. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in Iaphets portion: of Berofus his too speedy seating Gomer the sonne of Iaphet in Italie; and another of Iaphets sonnes Tubal, in Spaine: and also of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

S. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mefech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezech. Chap. 38. 39.

S. V.

Against the fabulous Berofus his Fiction, That the Italian Ianus was Noah.

S. VI.

That Gomer also, and his Son Togorma, of the Posteritie of Iaphet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread westward into Europe; & Northward into Sarmatia.

S. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iaphet, and of Mefech, of Aram, & Mefech of Iaphet.

S. VIII.

Of Ascanes and Riphath, the two Elder sonnes of Gomer.

S. IX.

Of the foure sons of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

S. X.

Of the second Booke.

S. X.

That the lesse of Chush, the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia; and of strange Tales, & Interpretations of Scripture, grounded vpon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

O F Iosephus his Tale of an Ethiopesse, wife to Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seate of Chush.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

†. III.

Chushill expounded for Ethiopia. Ezechiel 29. 10.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, chap. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

†. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Ethiopia.

†. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Senatherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa, are vnauidly made Ethiopians.

†. VII.

A farther exposition of the place, Esay 18. 1.

S. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

T HAT Mizraim the chiefe Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

†. II.

Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their Antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

†. IIII.

Against Pererius; That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred yeeres after the Creation: at least, that both it, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the Flood.

†. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Genes. 10. v. vlt. wherupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with some words of Phut, another son of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

S. XII.

Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.

O F the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Henites, & Harkites.

†. V.

Of Sini and Aruadi.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

S. XIII.

Of the sonnes of Chush, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

†. I.

T HAT the most of the sons of Chush, were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabaeus that robbed Iob: and of the Queen that came to Salomon.

†. II.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have been seated in the west Ethiopia, disprooued out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

S. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, chap. 9. v. 7.

S. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.

O F Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his sonnes.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, &c.

†. IIII.

Of the sons of Iocan, the other son of Heber.

†. V.

Of Ophir, one of Iocans sons, and of Peru: and of that voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the sonne of Iocan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the Families of Iocan; with a conclusion of this Discourse, touching the Plantation of the world.

CHAP.

The Contents

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.

OF the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: & of the degrees of humane societie.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first kings.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

THAT Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Soueraine Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue beene of iust authority.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninue: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Vr of the Chaldees.

§. IIII.

Of the aets of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

§. V.

That wee are not to meruaile how so many kingdomes could be credded about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and of Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names asfine vnto it.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.

Of the warres of Ninus: and lastly, of his Warre against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magicke Arts; and of diuers kindes of Magicke.

§. I.

THAT Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.

Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the auuncient Magicke is not to be condemned; though the Deuill here, as in other kindes, hath sought to obtrude euill things under the name and colour of good things.

§. IIII.

That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

§. V.

The abuse of things, which may bee found in all kindes, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kindes of unlawfull Magicke.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Deuill seemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead, by the power of the deuill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his Wife Semiramis: and of other her aets.

§. I.

OF the magnificent building of Ninue by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage, and education: and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

§. IIII.

Of the second Booke.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramids of Egypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

§. II.

A proposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

§. III.

The answer to one of the Obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

§. IIII.

The answer to another of the Obiections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the Obiections, shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though wee make not Abraham the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two Brethren should bee respected.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons, prouing that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

§. X.

Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to haue bin king, lyes betwene Coelesyria, and Arabia Petraa.

§. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.

That it is not improbable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the countries whence they came: which if it bee so, wee need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

S. I.

A Brieft of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficultie in resolving of the truth in these points.

S. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, & other wise, it appears that Chams reigne in Egypt began in the yeere after the Flood 191.

S. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents; oftentimes many under one King.

S. IIII.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

S. V.

Of the time when Osiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus, the sonne of Osiris.

S. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptus, Orus and the two Sesostris, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sesostris.

S. VII.

Of Bafiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queene Thermutis, that tooke up Moses out of the water.

S. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was under whom Moses was borne: and why it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

S. I.

OF the time of Moses birth: and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

S. II.

Of diuers Cities & places in Egypt, mentioned in this story or elsewhere in the Scripture.

S. III.

Of the cruelties against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moyses his preservation and education.

S. IIII.

Of Moyses his flying out of Egypt, and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians, of his war in Aethiopia, and of his marriage therewith: Philo his judgement of his Pastorall life: and that of Peterinus of the Bookes of Genesis, & Iob.

S. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

S. VI.

Of the Solarie and Lunarie yeeres: & how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intercalation.

S. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth, towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Egypt.

S. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it selfe.

S. IX.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not as a low ebbe.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a Discourse of Lawes.

S. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronology, with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

S. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethros coming, who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

S. III.

Of the time when the Law was giuen: with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

S. IIII.

Of the name and meaning of the wordes, Law, and Right.

S. V.

S. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the Law eternall.

S. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

S. VII.

Of the written Law of God,

S. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarches by Tradition.

S. IX.

Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law: with a Note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

A proposall of nine other points to be considered; with a touch of the five first.

S. XI.

Of the sixt point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

S. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

S. XIII.

Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficultie is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

S. XIIIII.

If there were not anie Religion, nor Iudgements to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

S. XV.

Of humane Law, written, and unwritten.

S. XVI.

That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what sort.

INSTRUCTIONS Resolution is expressed in terms of the lines per millimeter recorded by a particular film under specified conditions. Numerals in chart indicate the number of lines per millimeter in adjacent "T-shaped" groupings.

In microfilming, it is necessary to determine the reduction ratio and multiply the number of lines in the chart by this value to find the number of lines recorded by the film. As an aid in determining the reduction ratio, the line above is 100 millimeters in length. Measuring this line in the film image and dividing the length into 100 gives the reduction ratio. Example: the line is 20 mm. long in the film image, and $100 \div 20 = 5$.

Examine "T-shaped" line groupings in the film with microscope, and note the number adjacent to finest lines recorded sharply and distinctly. Multiply this number by the reduction factor to obtain resolving power in lines per millimeter. Example: 7.9 group of lines is clearly recorded while lines in the 10.0 group are not distinctly separated. Reduction ratio is 5, and $7.9 \times 5 = 39.5$ lines per millimeter recorded satisfactorily. $10.0 \times 5 = 50$ lines per millimeter which are not recorded satisfactorily. Under the particular conditions, maximum resolution is between 39.5 and 50 lines per millimeter.

Resolution, as measured on the film, is a test of the entire photographic system, including lens, exposure, processing, and other factors. These rarely utilize maximum resolution of the film. Vibrations during exposure, lack of critical focus, and exposures yielding very dense negatives are to be avoided.
